Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the day has been set apart for a special purpose. I notice that there are some persons in the galleries who are evidently specially interested in the special order of the day. I do not propose to be put in an embarrassing position in the House. If anyone wants to discuss an appropriation bill, they should know they are doing it in the time that is set apart for eulogies.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman, then, objects, Mr. Speaker, for the reason that he wants to accommodate people in the galleries in the purpose for which they have assembled?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that all this colloquy is out of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can say what he pleases; but I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three weeks from next Tuesday, on account of important business, he not having been home since November last.

SILVER-WEDDING PRESENT TO THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to lay before the House a letter addressed to him, which is of interest to all the Members, and have it printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 20, 1911.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I write, at the request of Mrs. Taft, to convey to you and, through you, to the Members of the House of Representatives an expression of our very high appreciation of the sentiments of friendship on the part of yourself and your colleagues which prompted the gift to us on the occasion of our silver-wedding anniversary of the magnificent set of silver plates. We will ever cherish the gift, and even more the good will of our friends who constitute the popular branch of the Sixty-second Congress.

With an assurance of our warm thanks, believe me, my dear Mr. Speaker, Gratefully and sincerely, yours, WM. H. TAFT.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

EULOGIES ON JOHN WARWICK DANIEL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order of the day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion by Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Saturday, the 24th day of June, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JOHN WARWICK DANIEL, late a Senator from the State of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will please take the chair.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

House resolution 223.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for the tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN W. DANIEL, late a Senator from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent ability and illustrious public services, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial services, shall adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, in the death of JOHN WARWICK DANIEL the Commonwealth of Virginia has lost her most beloved as well as her most eminent citizen, the Senate of the United States one of its most honored and distinguished Members, the South a loyal and devoted son, and the country at large a statesman whose patriotic endeavors were neither circumscribed by party lines nor confined to any section of the American Republic.

We are met to-day for the purpose of paying sincere tribute to the memory and fame of this great Virginian.

Although I enjoyed for many years the high privilege of his personal acquaintance and friendship and was associated with him more or less intimately in the discharge of those political and public functions in which we had a like interest and, although in common with every other Virginian I feel the keenest pride in his brilliant career and stainless life, I am not unmindful of my inability to do justice to a subject so well worthy the loftiest expressions of praise and eulogy. For this reason I shall only attempt a brief sketch, a bare outline, of a life which is destined to fill many of the brighest pages of the history of a State which has given to the world so many pre-eminently great and noble men. To those who shall follow me I shall leave the pleasing task of portraying his character and recounting his achievements.

For more than 40 years, many of them the most eventful in its history, Senator DANIEL was a conspicuous figure in the life of Virginia. For more than half of this period he occupied a seat in the Senate of the United States, where he served his State and country with singular ability and won for himself great distinction and enduring fame.

He was born in Lynchburg, Va., on the 5th day of September, 1842, and there, after an illness which covered many sad and weary months, he entered into the Great Beyond on the evening of the 29th of June, 1910. His biographers tell us he came of a family greatly distinguished in the annals of Virginia, and this is easy of belief for those of us who were so fortunate as to be brought into personal contact with him, and who were thus afforded the opportunity to observe his innate refinement, his charming manners, and his courtly and dignified bearing. His father, William Daniel, jr., sat for many years upon the bench of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, and enjoys the reputation of having been a just, learned, and incorruptible judge. His grandfather, William Daniel, sr., was also a jurist of high character and enviable repute, so that Senator DANIEL may be said to have been born to the profession of which, in after life, he was so eminent a member and which he so conspicuously adorned.

His education was received at the private schools of Lynchburg, at Lynchburg College, and at the famous university school so long conducted by that distinguished educator, Prof. Gessner Harrison.

He was but 18 and yet at school when the tocsin of war between the States was sounded. Instantly he laid down his studies, and promptly—yea, even joyously—he enlisted as a private soldier in a cavalry company raised and organized in Lynchburg. This command had seen no service in the field when young DANIEL received a second lieutenant's commission from the governor of Virginia and was assigned to the Twenty-seventh Virginia Infantry Regiment, of which he subsequently became the adjutant, and with which he served with distinction in the first battle of Manassas. In this, the first of the many bloody conflicts in which he participated, he received three wounds, one of which came dangerously near to permanently disabling him, although such was his intrepid spirit that only a short period elapsed before he was again with his command and at the front.

Having been elected adjutant of the Eleventh Virginia Regiment of Infantry, he served with this command until March, 1863, participating in all the bloody conflicts in which up to that time it was engaged. At Boonesboro, in September, 1862, he was again wounded and temporarily disabled, but so wonderful were his recuperative powers and youthful vigor that within 90 days he again reported for duty on the firing line.

At the conclusion of his service with this command he was commissioned adjutant general and assigned to duty upon the staff of Gen. Jubal A. Early, where he served with conspicuous gallantry and marked efficiency until, on May 5, 1864, at the Battle of the Wilderness, he received the cruel wound which left him a cripple for life, and on account of which, in after years, in love and admiration, his people conferred upon him the proud title of the "Lame Lion of Lynchburg."

The war over, this maimed and battle-scarred young hero, with unshaken courage and undaunted spirit, began his preparation for the battle of life—that stern conflict in which he was destined to win great civic victories—by entering the law school of the University of Virginia. Having completed his law course at this famous institution of learning, he at once began the practice of the profession in which he rose rapidly to distinction.

Others have spoken elsewhere, and others still will speak here, of his brilliant career as a lawyer. I may only say that his forensic triumphs were many and great, that he was not only distinguished as a practitioner of the law, but that he contributed abundantly to the jurisprudence of his country. His book, "Daniel on Negotiable Instruments," is justly regarded by the legal profession as a work of great merit and recognized authority, and had he bequeathed to posterity no other evidence of his high legal attainments, his reputation as a lawyer would rest secure upon this single production of his great brain.

But great lawyer as Senator DANIEL unquestionably was, he will be remembered chiefly by the people of his State as an orator who was without a rival in his day and generation. He loved his profession and never wholly withdrew from its practice, although early in his career he seems to have realized that it was too narrow a field for the display of his great and varied mental powers.

Moreover, he had scarcely begun the practice of the law when it became apparent to him that the State for which he had so often risked his life upon the battle field again stood in need of his services. As a result of the war many of her civil institutions had been swept away, and now her very civilization was seriously threatened. To rescue that civilization from the perils with which it was beset, the corrupt and deadly influences by which it was surrounded, and to restore to the real people of Virginia the instrumentalities of civil government and the guaranties of peace and social order was the herculean task to which young DANIEL, and the noble band of devoted men with whom he was associated, resolutely and courageously addressed themselves. In the memorable struggle which followed, a contest between virtue and intelligence upon the one side and vice and ignorance upon the other, the soul-stirring eloquence of JOHN W. DANIEL was heard from the mountains to the sea. And thus early he entered upon that splendid political career which continued for more than 40 years, and which was only terminated when he was smitten by the hand of death.

Commencing in 1869, he faithfully served the people of the city of Lynchburg and of Campbell County in the State legislature, at first in the house of delegates and afterwards in the senate, for a period of 10 years.

In the year of 1881 he became the candidate of the Democratic Party for the governorship of Virginia. His opponent was the erudite and accomplished William E. Cameron, who, like himself, had behind his candidacy a brilliant record as a Confederate soldier. The overshadowing issue was one that related to the settlement of the State's public indebtedness. Cameron was the nominee of what was then known as the readjuster party. The campaign which followed was a memorable one, perhaps the most memorable in the political annals of the State, but from the outset the result was a foregone conclusion.

This was the only defeat, if defeat it may really be said to have been, which JOHN W. DANIEL ever sustained at the hands of the people of Virginia. He came out of the contest the idol of his party. Henceforth he was without a rival in its affections.

Three years later he was elected to membership in this body from the Lynchburg district, but before he had completed his term of service he was chosen for the seat in the United States Senate, which he continued uninterruptedly to occupy up to his death.

The actual senatorial service of this great patriot and statesman covered a period of more than 23 years, but he had been reelected to succeed himself for still another term, and so firmly enthroned was he in the hearts of the people of Virginia that it was quite universally conceded that the exalted position which he had so long adorned was to be his until his life's end.

The length of the service in the Senate of the United States of no other Virginian ever approached that of JOHN W. DANIEL. In the earlier days of the Republic Richard Henry Lee, James Monroe, and John Randolph of Roanoke, had represented the "Mother of States and of statesmen" in that great body, and later on their places had been taken and long occupied by James M. Mason and R. M. T. Hunter, but no one of these greatly honored and justly distinguished Virginians served for half so long a period as the six terms for which JOHN W. DANIEL was successively chosen. This fact strongly attests the extent to which the confidence of the people of Virginia was reposed in him. That by no word or deed of his was that confidence ever for one moment shaken is a tribute as great as it is rare to the high efficiency of the public services, the purity of the patriotism, and the sublimity of the character of this splendid specimen of superb manhood.

His achievements in the world of politics were phenomenal. A mere recital of the many honors which a grateful people have heaped upon him show that not since the early days of the Republic has any other Virginian been so distinguished by public and political preferment. His brilliant career has been absolutely unique in the recent political history of Virginia. And yet, to his everlasting honor be it said, these distinctions and honors came to him as the well-earned rewards of splendid services rendered his State and country both in war and in peace, and in no single instance as the result of astute political manipulation and management. His steady and continuous advancement into public favor was due to no factitious circumstances. The love and esteem of a great and noble people can only be won and permanently retained by those whose lives and deeds have been such as to merit popular favor and to deserve a people's trust and confidence.

From the first hour of his public service to the last moment of his life the great powers of Senator DANIEL's superb intellect were consecrated to his country. He died as he had lived, in the full and perfect enjoyment of the love and confidence of the whole people of a great State, to the preservation of whose civil and political institutions and the advancement of whose highest and best interests he had dedicated the noblest endeavors of mind and of body. His precious memory will live long in the hearts of the people of Virginia, and his great and good deeds will ever remain a rich heritage to his descendants and his country.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure of only a slight acquaintance with Senator DANIEL. We lived at the same hotel, and while I saw him frequently I rarely had an opportunity to converse with him. He was one of the most courtly, accomplished gentlemen I ever had the pleasure of meeting. He had a wonderful charm in conversation, and drew men to him in ordinary social intercourse by the same spell of magnetism with which he swayed the largest audiences. The characteristic that appealed most to me in this gentleman was the simplicity and naturalness of his manners, his earnestness, and the apparent goodness of his heart. It seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, that his good heart shone out of his eyes as strongly as I ever knew it to shine in any human countenance.

An incident was related to me not long ago by one of his friends, a man who loved him, that shows I was not wrong in this estimate of his goodness. Senator DANIEL once had a negro servant named Peter White, who was taken very sick some time after leaving his service. The Senator found it out accidentally, called on Peter, and saw that every attention and comfort was given to him. He called not once but several times on this poor colored man, and in doing so had to climb a steep flight of stairs. When you bear in mind that he was a cripple and always went on crutches it is apparent how much it meant to him to visit a poor, sick man under those circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, we love and honor this great man for his splendid qualities as soldier, orator, law writer, statesman, but to my mind he never did a nobler thing nor one which reflects greater credit upon his memory than the attention shown by him in his quiet, unobtrusive way to that poor servant. That was the act of a true man; that act showed the heart; and I repeat, sir, it was better than all his other great deeds.

I had the pleasure of hearing only one of Senator DANIEL'S orations. It was delivered in this Hall about eight years ago on the occasion of the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the removal of this Capital to this city. The President and his Cabinet were here, the members of the Supreme Court, all the foreign legations, the Senate and the House of Representatives, and the galleries were packed to their very limit. I never saw a more distinguished audience. There were a number of speakers and the program was very long. When Senator DANIEL arose it was about 5 o'clock, and he held that great audience spellbound for nearly an hour. His address was carefully prepared and read from manuscript, but he delivered it so gracefully, with such a pleasing elocution, that I doubt if the average person knew that he was referring to notes. To me, sir, that was the most marvelous oration to which I ever listened, and when he finished the greatest tribute of praise that I ever heard given by one man to another was paid to Senator DANIEL by the late Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts. It was about 6 o'clock when Senator DANIEL'S address concluded. Many in that vast audience had engagements, and fully one-half of them arose and left the room. Senator Hoar advanced to the front of the platform, folded his arms, and stood looking on them as they filed out of the room. When the last one had gone, leaving about one-half of the audience present, he said, in his sweet, mellow tones, "Unhappy is he who cometh after a king."

Mr. Speaker, that was a beautiful tribute, and a truthful one, for he was to follow a great king of oratory. A wonderful oration had been delivered by Senator DANIEL, and no one appreciated it better than Senator Hoar, himself a fine speaker.

The last votes cast by Senator DANIEL in the Hall of the Senate were during the discussions on the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill two years ago. There was no stancher Democrat in the Union than JOHN W. DANIEL. He voted against that bill as a whole, because he believed it unjust in many respects; but when the question of a duty upon lumber was presented, in preparing the different schedules, he, along with the majority of his colleagues on the Democratic side, voted in favor of it. He believed such a vote necessary to place that great product of the South on a par with many other articles which were then being legislated upon, and he thought that free lumber in such a bill as that would be a most unfair discrimination against the South.

Mr. Speaker, I, in common with a number of other good Democrats in this Chamber, had cast a similar vote when that question was before us. And I assure you, sir, that I was a happy man when I saw the great DANIEL and many others of our honored leaders in the Senate take the same position there which many of us had taken here.

Senator DANIEL was a success in every walk of life. He gained renown as a soldier before he was 20 years of age. Starting as a private, he became a major before he was 20, and doubtless would have risen much higher had not an unfortunate bullet at the Battle of the Wilderness given him an awful wound, that caused him to go on crutches the remainder of his life. He was one of the best lawyers the State of Virginia ever produced. He was a great law writer. His book on "Negotiable Instruments" made DANIEL known and honored by thousands of young lawyers all over the country before they ever heard of JOHN W. DANIEL the orator, the Senator, and the statesman. And this great work will extend his fame for ages.

His record as a statesman is one that his country will ever recall with pride. As an orator he occupies the very front rank of American public speakers. I doubt if any man in our history since the days of the immortal triumvirate—Calhoun, Clay, and Webster—was his superior as an orator.

Mr. Speaker, this great man was loved and honored throughout the Republic. His memory is a precious heritage not only to Virginia but to the entire country. I think, sir, that we may well say of him, paraphrasing somewhat the famous aphorism about Washington, that JOHN W. DANIEL was brave in battle, great in every art of peace, and loved by all his countrymen.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, from the beginning Virginia has been rich in great men—great statesmen, great orators, great jurists, great soldiers. So long as the world exists the names of her illustrious sons will be among the noblest on fame's eternal beadroll.

Patrick Henry precipitated the Revolution; Thomas Jefferson penned the Declaration; George Washington made that Declaration good on Yorktown's blood-stained heights; James Madison was "father of the Constitution"; and John Marshall its chief expounder. Her bill of rights, written by George Mason, has been considered a model for more than a century and a quarter. These were followed by a long line of men, distinguished in peace and in war, whose records are among the precious treasures of the Republic.

JOHN WARWICK DANIEL ranks high among Virginia's worthies. So far as the public is concerned, he appeared in a fourfold character—soldier, lawyer, author, orator. The universal testimony of his companions in arms is that he was a fine soldier. His brethren of the Virginia bar bear witness that he was a successful practitioner of the noblest of professions. Lawyers and courts everywhere cite his law books as standard authorities. All the world knows that he was one of the foremost orators of his time, and it is his oratory more than anything else or all things else which will perpetuate his fame to coming generations. He was richly blessed with the divine gift of moving men's minds and hearts by the power of spoken words. He was lavishly endowed by nature with the elements and qualities which constitute an orator. Some men are so ugly and ungainly that it is a positive advantage to them as public speakers by reason of the pleasurable surprise which their eloquence creates. Others are so handsome and prepossessing that they win the hearts of their audience before they have opened their lips. To the latter category JOHN WARWICK DANIEL undoubtedly belonged. Of commanding presence, with a handsome and leonine countenance, courtly manners, a musical voice of great compass and far-reaching quality, a strong and well-trained mind, a warm and generous heart, a vivid imagination, he presented a superb picture to the eye and appealed with compelling force to the passions and emotions of all who heard him. He possessed the advantages of high family connections and of a collegiate education, to which was added the glamour of martial fame, achieved in his early manhood on many a bloody field. An Englishman dearly loves a lord and the average American dearly loves a soldier, and it can not be doubted that Senator DANIEL'S military record aided him materially in his political battles. This is attested by the fact that Virginians fondly called him "the Lame Lion of Lynchburg"—most assuredly a helpful and fortunate sobriquet. For a generation he was the idol of his native State, and it was agreed by common consent that he should remain in the Senate so long as he lived, which he did. His reelection every six years was a mere formality to comply with the Constitution and the statutes of the land.

Virginia's great lyric orator, Patrick Henry, was dubbed "The forest-born Demosthenes." JOHN WARWICK DANIEL may be not inaptly denominated Virginia's Cicero. Henry's fame rests almost entirely on tradition; but DANIEL'S is bottomed on the words which he actually spoke. The greatest of his orations is that on Gen. Robert E. Lee, which would have aroused envy in the bosom of Tully himself. DANIEL'S masterful oration recalls and illustrates what Daniel Webster said of eloquence in his oration on John Adams and Thomas Jefferson:

It must exist in the man, in the subject, and in the occasion. Affected passion, intense expression, the pomp of declamation, all may aspire to it; they can not reach it. It comes, if it come at all, like the outbreaking of a fountain from the earth or the bursting forth of volcanic fires, with spontaneous, original, native force.

Webster was a great orator; he had a great subject on a great occasion, and he delivered a great oration. DANIEL was a great orator; he had a great subject on a great occasion, and he delivered a great oration—one which will be read with delight so long as our language is spoken by the children of men.

There was once a man named Hamilton, in the British Parliament, who delivered one splendid speech and could never be induced to make another speech. Hence he was nicknamed "Single-speech" Hamilton. Such was not the case with Senator DANIEL. He delivered many excellent speeches, several fine orations, but I give it as my literary opinion, for what it is worth, that his oration over Lee is the one by which he will be remembered, and by which he would chose to be remembered.

His theme was his old commander, one of the greatest of English-speaking captains; the occasion was the unveiling of the recumbent statue of that famous soldier, one of the most beautiful statues ever fashioned by sculptor's chisel; the scene, Lexington, Va., gem of the mountains, one of the loveliest spots betwixt the two seas, where Stonewall Jackson taught and prayed, and whence he went forth to win world-wide and imperishable renown. DANIEL'S heart was in that oration. In it he will live; through it he will speak to his countrymen forever.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with instinctive hesitancy that I approach the presentation of the life and character of such a man as Senator JOHN W. DANIEL. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that I am in the presence of the life record of a great and noble man. Born to a proud name, reared under splendid influences, of superb presence, of brilliant mind and extensive education, the record of preferment of JOHN W. DANIEL by the people of Virginia marks a popularity that we find rarely equaled and never surpassed in this country. It is a difficult task, Mr. Speaker, to take up the record of such a life on an occasion like this and select its choicest flowers and present them to his admiring countrymen. In such a brilliant, useful life as that of Senator DANIEL we find along its pathway the blooming flowers of the sweetest charities of life, the gentlest graces of a chivalrous manhood, and a friendship and love for his fellow man that made for him a constantly increasing circle of friends. In his life, as I knew him, there shone in his character and permeated his life, as the soft rays of the setting sun rest upon a beautiful landscape, the inspiration of poesy that gives charm to intellect and beauty to life.

He stood nearer to that true type of the southern man that linked the heroic age of the South prior to the Civil War with the changed conditions and ruling spirit of the people that prevailed after the conflict than any man I knew.

On the outbreak of the Civil War, Senator DANIEL left his studies and took his place in the Confederate Army. A courteous, brave young man, with his bosom swelling with pride and love for Virginia, reared midst the grandest and most heroic traditions that made the Old Dominion famous, honored, and respected throughout the civilized world, it was but natural for such a youth to step promptly into the ranks of the sons of Virginia, when the soil of the mother State was invaded by her northern foes.

His record as a soldier during that fierce conflict between the States of the South and the North is well testified to by the wounds he received. No hardship, no suffering from wounds could deter him, as a southern youth, from discharging his duties to the South. When ruin and desolation settled like a pall on the States of the South and reconstruction, the result of unrestrained sectional hatred, was reveling in its carnival of crime over a prostrate, brave, and helpless people, it was but natural that Virginia, in her hour of need, turned to such a brave son as DANIEL and bade him to come to her legislative councils. He was elected to the house and the senate of the State legislature. It was there in the ancient halls of Virginia, where the architects of our Federal Constitution had pointed out the oppressions of King George, that he demonstrated an oratory that gave him the just tribute of being Virginia's most courtly and charming orator since the close of the Civil War. But his star of destiny led him to a broader field. Virginia sent him to the National Capital, there to nobly preserve the glorious record of his great State. Free from sectional feeling, yielding to the inexorable arbitrament of arms, out of the ashes of defeat and the cruel blemishes of war, as a Senator from Virginia in the United States Senate he wrought sublimely for home, State, and country. What a splendid career was his, and victory was his greatest crown. It requires conditions, Mr. Speaker, to produce such men, as it required war to bring Gen. Lee and Gen. Grant to be known and honored throughout the world.

A distinguished man of our country, in speaking of conditions in the South before the war, said that the South, before the war, "stood for an impossible institution and a belated order of society." "Belated order of society." Could a society peculiar to the South—from the formation of the Government to 1860, impossible elsewhere by reason of the absence of conditions—could such a society, that gave Washington, Jefferson, Patrick Henry, John Marshall, and a long line of great names—a "society" that produced Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, and thousands of others, which same "society" gave impulse and tone to the life of such a man as Senator DANIEL—could such a "society" be denominated "belated"? It is the output of a narrow mind, where too much learning has made him mad.

Senator DANIEL loved the survivors of his brave comrades, and a true, cordial grasp of his hand was always extended to a Confederate soldier. He was with Gen. Lee, and the fires of his soul were kindled into a flame that burnt on the altar of his great heart, until death claimed him, by his contact with the world's greatest commander. It has been said that Senator DANIEL'S speech, in telling the story of Gen. Lee's life, will live as a true specimen of sublime oratory as long as Appomattox will be mentioned in history. The prone statue of Gen. Lee above his last resting place has given the genius of Valentine an honored niche in the world's temple of art, but DANIEL'S oration at the shrine will live after marble and brass has crumbled to dust.

Senator DANIEL was wise, prudent, and far-seeing, and he advocated and recommended that we should embody in our Democratic national platform Democratic standards in a straight, forward, common-sense manner. I quote from a leading Virginia paper what Senator DANIEL said about the platform to be drawn at the last Democratic national convention:

What we need, as I think, is a common-sense, plain, straightforward Democratic platform, which will stop at that. If the convention dissipates into persiflage the voters will likely act accordingly and go in all directions. No great reform can be made in a day. Wise statesmanship must deal with transportation and with questions of the tariff and how to deal with the trusts sedately and prudently. The conserving spirit should never give way before the hot and destructive spirit that wants everything now and refused to emulate nature in her perfecting patient processes. Napoleon was great; but he lost by impatience. How poor are they who have not patience. What wound did ever heal but by degrees?

The extreme question of State's rights that came to the issue of battle has long been settled, but as long as the United States is a federation of States, questions of Federal and State jurisdiction will continue to arise and will be passed to the peaceful arbitration of the courts. Democracy has its fixed principle on the subject, and none has ever better stated them than Thomas Jefferson in his first inauguration address, when he stood for "the support of the State's governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for their domestic concerns and surest bulwarks against anti-Republican tendencies. The preservation of the General Government in its whole Constitution vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad."

These were brave words addressed to our party. The Democratic party sadly misses the wise counsel of such a man. I read the following tribute at the death of Senator DANIEL from the Richmond Times-Dispatch—the leading paper of the State of Virginia—and it so impressed me that I desire to help perpetuate it by giving it further publication on this occasion:

JOHN W. DANIEL breathed the true spirit of southern chivalry with all the grace of the perfect gentleman. He was urbane and gracious to all, humble in the flower and glory of his manhood, gallant and forbearing, gentle and considerate. He never stooped, as a man, to the baser deeds of politics, and he never forgot, as a gentleman, the duties of his station and his birth. How much richer heritage that is than if he had been otherwise and died possessed of $100,000,000.

Could greater praise be given a man? It comes from the leading newspaper of his State. His name and record is more "valuable than money." The encomium was truthful and deserved.

Mr. Speaker, I have said more than I intended to say. I was a great admirer of Senator DANIEL, and I was frequently in his company.

He has passed, Mr. Speaker, to his eternal rest, but his hold upon the hearts and affections of the people of the "Old Dominion" is undiminished, because he was a son "after the heart" of his native State. He will live long in the hearts of the men and women who love the South, its noble record and traditions, because we believe that Senator DANIEL typified what was truest and best in southern character—he was candid, courteous, and courageous, not on particular occasions and in certain things, but at all times and in all things.

Virginia, I dare say, has mourned the loss of sons with more illustrious careers, but never, Mr. Speaker, was there one, nor will there be in the future, a son of Virginia truer and prouder of the name, fame, and grandeur of Old Virginia than JOHN W. DANIEL, who sank into his grave, in the soil of his native State, without a stain or suspicion on his life.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker—

The wine of life keeps oozing drop by drop;
The leaves of life keep falling one by one.

It is given to but few men to shine with such resplendent luster in so many varied walks of life as shone our lamented friend, Senator JOHN WARWICK DANIEL, of Virginia.

While but a youth, 18 years of age, he joined the military forces of the Old Dominion, and as a soldier, fighting for the cause which he believed to be right, won his spurs upon the field of battle. Brave, fearless, dauntless, he gradually rose from the ranks to a major's station in the Southern Army. So badly wounded on May 6, 1864, during the Battle of the Wilderness, that he never was able thereafter to rejoin his regiment—for a minie ball had shattered his left leg and rendered it practically useless during the remainder of his life—he never allowed any hatred of those who fought on the opposite side to rankle in his breast. With the surrender of Appomattox he cheerfully turned from thoughts of war to the arts of peace. And in those arts of peace he won additional renown and glory, not alone for himself and his kindred, but for his State and his country.

For as a young lawyer he soon attained great distinction as a member of the bar of the State of Virginia, and early in his career, by reason of his masterful knowledge of the law and his brilliant forensic ability, he became one of its brightest ornaments.

As an author his fame soon became international. His work on "Negotiable Instruments" will continue a standard authority in that branch of jurisprudence long after we of the present generation shall have moldered into dust.

As a statesman his life and character will prove an inspiration to thousands who will come after us. His unquestioned honesty, his steadfastness of purpose, his devout patriotism, his unswerving devotion to duty, will encourage them to keep alive the fires of the noblest traditions of the Republic and to uphold inviolate the honor and the glory of this great American Commonwealth.

His classic features and his noble mien at once challenged the admiration of the beholder and stamped him as a man of mark in any assemblage.

For nearly a quarter of a century he graced the floor of the Senate. During all the years of that long and eventful period he participated in the discussion of practically all of the great questions that demanded in their solution the highest qualities of mind and statesmanship.

He was a strict party man, but he never descended to the low level of blind, bitter, and vindictive partisanship in dealing with political opponents.

His own naturally broad intellect made him tolerant of the narrowness of men less liberally endowed than himself. Being of pure mind himself, he was willing to concede purity of motive to those whose views differed from his own.

Himself a man of strong and pronounced opinions on problems of great public import, he nevertheless permitted men to differ from him without impugning their integrity or questioning their fidelity to the people's welfare.

He scorned the obsequious cant of the political hypocrite, and he never sought to win the plaudits of the multitude by resorting to the dubious devices of the charlatan and the demagogue.

He was one of that noble type which has been the embodiment of true greatness since the dawn of recorded time—that noble type of men who would preferably and gladly welcome defeat rather than stoop to conquer.

Small wonder, therefore, that he became a popular idol among the people of his own State. Small wonder, therefore, that when the solemn church bells tolled his funeral knell the grief of his bereaved fellow citizens was no less poignant than that of those who were nearest and dearest to him.

Mr. Speaker, I had been a Member of this House but a brief period when I first learned to know and to esteem Senator DANIEL. He visited my home city of San Francisco during the summer of 1900, and I had the pleasure of showing him some slight courtesies on that occasion. Some of our volunteer regiments were returning from the Philippines at that time, and he repeatedly expressed his great gratification upon the fact that we were indeed a reunited country, and that the War with Spain had helped to wipe out what little sectional feeling that still might have slumbered in either the North or the South.

The climate, the scenery, and the matchless fertility of California were a revelation to him, and to the very end of his days he spoke of his trip to the Pacific coast as one of the most delightful experiences of his life. He often told me that he hoped on some future occasion to make a much more extended visit to that section of our common country. But it was not to be. The Great Master of the Universe, who rules the destinies of men even as of nations, called him to the sleep everlasting on June 29, 1910. His brilliant career was ended. His work on earth was accomplished. He passed on, full of honors, beloved by his colleagues in the Senate as well as by the Members of this House who had been privileged to know him. He lies at rest among his friends, his neighbors, and his kinsmen, in beautiful Spring Hill Cemetery, near his well-beloved city of Lynchburg. Peace be to his ashes!

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, unaccustomed to participation in commemorative exercises, and unapprised until within the last few days of the purpose to set apart this day for memorial services in honor of the late Senator DANIEL, I nevertheless feel that I can not let the occasion pass without joining with my colleagues in paying tribute to one who was my friend and townsman, and with whom for many years I was associated in public affairs.

Born in Lynchburg, Va., September 5, 1842, JOHN WARWICK DANIEL came from a patrician family and of a lineage noted for attainments in the field of law. His father was a distinguished member of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, and his grandfather was a jurist scarcely less renowned. Of a parentage accustomed to the atmosphere of culture and occupying a position of prominence in a society whose gentleness and refinement have been unsurpassed in any age of the Republic, young DANIEL received the home training as well as the formal education that only a well-born young Virginian of that day could receive. He was educated in the private schools of his native town, and later attended the Lynchburg College and Dr. Gessner Harrison's University School. From his schoolmates who still survive it is learned that JOHN DANIEL, even when a youth, exhibited a natural dignity of character and of outward bearing, although he was loved for his true comradeship, his kindly impulses, and his pleasant sociability. It was at the Harrison school that the call of duty summoned him to the defense of his native State at the outbreak of the Civil War. Although but 18 years of age, he immediately went to the front, and was soon made a second lieutenant. It is not my purpose here to-day to recount JOHN DANIEL'S long, faithful, and brave service in the war between the States.

Only a little more than a year has passed since his maimed figure was familiar to most of us who are gathered here to-day, and it bore mute witness to his courage on the field of battle, for it was during the fierce days in the Wilderness that DANIEL, then a major, while leading a charge of the Fifty-eighth Virginia Infantry, a part of Pegram's gallant division, received the shot that made him a cripple for life. That was in 1864. Previous to that he had been frequently promoted for gallantry and for valuable services, acting during a large part of the war as the chief of staff to Gen. Jubal A. Early, and being three times wounded on the open field. It was Gen. John B. Gordon, who afterwards referred to him as "the brave and brilliant DANIEL," and his courage and acuteness caused him to be selected for military duties of a responsible and difficult nature. The war ended while he was recovering from what was feared would be his death bed; only his splendid constitution and his unconquerable will caused him to survive his dangerous wound, and a guiding Providence gave him a life to live in eminent service of his State and his united country.

The political career of Maj. DANIEL—for so we have always called him in his home city—began almost immediately after the days of reconstruction. When the war was over he attended the law school of the University of Virginia, and there won prominence as a legal student and as a public speaker. The times in Virginia were politically chaotic; there was danger from political parasites who had come in to feast upon the wreck of a Commonwealth, and there was menace from the feverish radicalism within. Men of stern wills, with an unconquered love for Virginia, an abundant faith, and an unimpeachable integrity were needed in those days. There were many who, discouraged by the gloomy outlook, had left for newer States, there to begin life over; but it is characteristic of the man that DANIEL stayed.

To attempt to give, within the compass of these remarks, even a brief account of the part he played in the rebuilding of Virginia and placing her upon a firmer foundation is, of course, impossible. I may be permitted to recall what all Virginians and students of Virginia history know, that the name of DANIEL was linked with the leaders for conservative reform and for honorable disposition of the burdens of the State. He at once became a commanding figure among the men of his type and belief, and later was the central figure. Chosen in 1875 to represent his legislative district in the State senate, for seven years he there fought the battle for political honor and righteousness. During that time he twice was frustrated in his ambition to enter Congress; in 1877 he barely missed being nominated for governor of Virginia, and in 1881 he was selected to lead a brilliant, though unsuccessful, fight against the so-called Readjuster Party of that day.

In 1884 he was elected to the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress. From that day until the day he died Maj. DANIEL was a prominent figure in the national councils. Upon the death of Senator William Mahone, one year after, DANIEL became United States Senator from Virginia, and continued to serve his State and Nation in that capacity for 23 years. His part in the guiding of the Nation, both as an individual and as a Member of the Upper House of Congress, is too well known to demand repetition here. He was independent in opinion and fearless in action, and while his views could not always meet the unanimous approbation of his constituents, he was, nevertheless, reelected to the Senate four times without opposition. He was seven times a delegate at large from Virginia to the national conventions of his party, and gained recognition as a potent figure in framing the policies of the great political organization.

But to his neighbors and to the thousands that for a generation felt that no honor could be given him undeservedly Senator DANIEL was more than a successful figure in the uncertain battle ground of political strife. Regarded as the representative "Virginian of Virginians" for more than two decades, looked up to as the natural leader of important social and political movements within his State, he presented a figure whose unique presence and persistence need other explanations than those ordinarily assigned in seeking the causes of what is commonly termed success before the public. Senator DANIEL, in common with many of his contemporaries, was a man of unusual ability. He possessed a mind naturally molded and carefully trained in legal methods of thought and yet broadened into a capacity for wide comprehension as well as deepened by painstaking study of a multitude of diverse questions and subjects. He was more than ordinarily eloquent; he had the power of inspiring speech and the force of overwhelming denunciation or stinging sarcasm no less than he possessed the gift of persuasive words and tones. He was animated by real enthusiasm and drew men by the impelling force of his personal magnetism. He possessed a courage and a fire which won for him the sobriquet of "The Lame Lion of Lynchburg."

He occupied a position whose authority increased with his tenure. Experience taught him as it does all men of discernment. But these, Mr. Speaker, are things common to a multitude. Men possessing even such qualities have failed in maintaining their success because of some inherent weakness. The possession of ability and of courage accounts no more for the unique position of JOHN DANIEL in the esteem of his constituents than it explains the fact that his faults and errors of judgment did not diminish the greatness of his own career as similar errors had impaired the fortunes of others. I think we who knew the man will agree that there entered into the composition of his character qualities that far outweighed mistakes and magnified his abilities.

From the viewpoint of one who knew him intimately and loved to do him honor, I may define as one of the distinguishing characteristics of Maj. DANIEL his thoroughgoing democracy. His democracy of action and of belief was not the false democracy of the demagogue. Of patrician blood, reared in an aristocratic home, he was nevertheless the companion of the poor and uncultured as well as of the rich and the refined. Dignified of manner and of mien, he possessed a natural poise, not a practiced or an assumed pose. He loved to converse with the untutored man of the field or of the shop as well as with the savant at the gathering places. The Confederate veteran who had never worn a star or bar or chevron found him as good a comrade as did his own common messmate on the camping grounds of years before. Inheriting the social distinctions of antebellum society in Virginia, these distinctions did not confine his outlook in narrow conceptions of caste. His democracy was as well known as his dignity. It was the natural outgrowth of a deep-rooted belief which was seen not only in his personal conduct, but also in his political tenets, and which his culture and social inheritances made rare. Another distinguishing mark of his long career was the unquestioned integrity of the man. To few public men is it permitted that their absolute good faith shall not be doubted in the heat of political campaigns. The honesty of Senator DANIEL was his chief asset, if I may so speak of such a quality. His long public life, extending, as it did, over many political periods within his State and in the Nation, afforded opportunities for enemies to assail him at every point. Times changed and policies changed in the two score years of his public service, and yet through all of these vicissitudes he stood as a type of the honest man in politics and private life.

To his genuine Democracy of belief and of action and to his "Spartan integrity" should be added a third distinguishing characteristic. This was his unselfish conception of service. It is by no means a remarkable thing in these days for a man of ability, who is long in the employ of the people, to become rich. It is almost a sign of the age that a man who has ability shall sell it and thereby become more or less wealthy in material goods, or that a man who has the opportunity to profit better than the other man in the market places shall gain by that opportunity. It has almost become an evidence of incapacity in the estimation of many when a man does not devote his chief efforts to the assembling of worldly possessions and does not choose as the directions of his public service the paths to the greatest monetary profits. In my opinion, the life of Senator DANIEL is one of the most pertinent comments possible on the conceptions of the times. A brilliant lawyer, he chose to consider his constituents his chief clients; widely learned in legal subjects and the author of two textbooks in law that are recognized as authorities, he did not further exploit a field that was justly open to him lest it might interfere with the work which he had been chosen to do by those who trusted him; coming in contact with hundreds of opportunities whereby the very use of his name would mean handsome remuneration, he preferred that his name should be linked with the service that he rendered the people. Burdened as he was by the debts that he assumed, he chose rather to live on small means and give the entire force of his unusual energies and abilities in a life that was supremely unselfish—a life of real service unmixed with thought of private financial gain and unsullied by ambition for wealth alone.

With these elements of genuine democracy in belief and in practice, of unswerving personal integrity, and of unselfish devotion to his ideal of public service, which constituted traits so predominant in his character, added to his splendid abilities, inherited and achieved, the most remarkable fact of Senator DANIEL'S political position and career ceases to be a thing to be marveled at and becomes an object lesson. I refer to the fact that his persistent and wonderful popularity among his constituents was not in any degree or way based upon or aided by political organization. It seems almost a curious thing, in these days of literary bureaus, political agencies, secret understandings, exchanging of favors, and the hundred and one theatrical accessories thought to be necessary to the obtaining of applause and the reaping of benefits upon the political stage, that any man, however capable and however honest and unselfish, could not only play an important part before the seemingly fickle public for a lifetime, but could be the recipient of continued honor and reverence and affection from two generations of a people. And yet such was the part that Senator DANIEL played without studied effort. What honors he received were awarded willingly. What trusts were given him to hold were bestowed because of an unfailing and unviolated faith in the man. What services were assigned him to perform were so designated because his devotion to service was undoubted. He needed no political organization with which to bolster up the foundations of his popularity. He gave no offices to induce adherence. He scorned to temporize with political enemies in order to attain personal ambitions. There was no trading of party principles upon grounds of "expediency" when expediency meant private gain. None of the methods of the ordinary self-seeker was the secret with which he led his charmed life upon so many political battlefields. He stood alone in the invulnerable armor of his own honesty; he fought with the resistless weapons of a deep sympathy and an intelligent statesmanship; he conquered in the genuine affection of his countrymen.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that I have succeeded in paying but a poor tribute to the memory of one so close to the hearts of his colleagues and of his fellow Virginians and his neighbors. Even to those who have been wont to participate in his daily life, to those who knew his faults and recognized his abilities and felt the influence of his character and example, a true estimate, or even an adequate portrayal of the man as he was is difficult, if, indeed, it is possible. I do not pretend to have accomplished either. I regard it more important, more in keeping with the passion of his own life, that the self-sacrificing honesty and service of JOHN W. DANIEL shall remain in the minds of his fellow servants as an inspiring example and in the hearts of his fellow citizens as a precious heritage. No eloquence of tongue, no multitude of pleasant-sounding words, no heaping up of tributes can add to its beauty; no criticism of his errors or cavilling at his faults can detract from its worth.

And so the personality of the man, with its differentiating characteristics, remains, though the eloquent voice is hushed and the sympathetic heart is still. JOHN W. DANIEL stands out as a true and unusual type of the great men who have become a part of the history of this Nation. His was the part of being not only honored and trusted, but also loved. His was the dignity that naturally clothes a lofty character; his was the courtliness that is the unassumed mark of a real gentleman; his was the democracy of belief and action that arises from the unpretended humility of soul; his was the deep sympathy that comes with a mind that understands and a heart that feels; and his was the unbetrayed trust, held sacred in a life sternly conforming to an unchanged ideal and kept with a passionate realization of its worth as that most precious thing, the faith of one man in the honor of another.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, once more, and for the sixth time in twice as many years, the Virginia delegation in Congress is called upon to pay tribute to the character and public services of a deceased colleague.

The death of one-half of our number in 12 years suggests the thought that "in the midst of life we are in death," and brings the solemn reminder that the young as well as the old may be called at any hour, and that we would do well to make the necessary preparation for our departure.

Since we so frequently contemplate death and know that we shall before long explore the "uncharted seas" ourselves, we may well view it as a state less mysterious and even more natural than life.

The brave man learns, as the soldier does, to put the fear of death behind him, and if he thinks of it at all it will be at such times when the scythe has cut down some loved one or some honored friend and colleague, as is the case with us this hour.

In the death of JOHN W. DANIEL Virginia lost a matchless orator, soldier, and statesman. In the councils of the State and at the firesides of her citizens of every class and political faith there was sincere grief when DANIEL died.

There was among us a sentiment for him that grew with each succeeding year and spread from fireside to fireside, until the home that loved him not nor grieved for him was hard to find in Virginia. Nor was his death a loss to his State alone. Long since he had proved his worth and won his reputation in a broader field. He had demonstrated by ability and service his right to rank and be remembered among the great statesmen, orators, authors, and lawyers of his country.

JOHN WARWICK DANIEL was the only son of Judge William Daniel, jr., and Sarah Ann Warwick, his wife. He was born in Lynchburg, Va., on September 5, 1842, and died in Lynchburg on June 29, 1910.

His early education was in the private schools of his native city and at the university school of Prof. Gessner Harrison in Albemarle County, Va. He was at this school in 1861 when the Civil War commenced. He at once enlisted as a private in a Lynchburg cavalry troop, serving only a few weeks before he was assigned to duty as drillmaster and lieutenant in Company A, Eleventh Virginia Infantry, forming later a part of the famous "Stonewall Brigade."

Later he was made adjutant of his regiment and then chief of staff of Lieut. Gen. Jubal A. Early, with the rank of major.

His gallant and brilliant record as a Confederate soldier closed at the Battle of the Wilderness, May 6, 1864, where he was wounded and crippled for life while rallying and leading his brigade.

The close of the war found DANIEL poor and maimed for life, but undaunted and undiscouraged. He entered the law class of the University of Virginia in the fall of 1865 and prepared himself for the profession which he so adorned as lawyer and author.

He commenced the practice of law in Lynchburg with his father, and early won confidence and success. Notwithstanding his ardent and exacting public duties, he continued to practice his profession so long as he lived, conducting with marked ability in our highest courts, both State and Federal, many cases involving questions of greatest importance and intricacy, yet finding time from a life overcrowded with labor to prepare and publish Daniel on Negotiable Instruments and Daniel on Attachments, valued textbooks, universally used in our schools and courts.

In 1869 his political career was launched, and it is as statesman and Representative that DANIEL rendered his greatest service and won his greatest fame.

He was elected to the Virginia House of Representatives in 1869 and served until 1872. In 1875 he was sent to the Virginia Senate and served until 1881.

In the Virginia House and Senate DANIEL was recognized as an able and fearless leader and statesman, and there laid the foundation for his future political career deep and strong in the confidence and affection of the people of his State.

In 1876 DANIEL was the Democratic elector at large for Virginia in the presidential election. He was delegate at large for his State in the national Democratic conventions of 1880, 1888, 1892, 1896, 1900, 1904, and 1908, and temporary chairman of the convention of 1896 and chairman of the resolution (platform) committees of 1900 and 1904.

He was Democratic nominee for governor of Virginia in 1881, but was defeated by William E. Cameron, the readjuster candidate. In 1884 he was elected to the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress. In 1885 he was elected to the United States Senate to succeed Gen. William Mahone for the term beginning March 4, 1887, and reelected as the unanimous choice of his party for this high position in 1891, 1897, 1904, and 1910.

In 1901 he was elected as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of Virginia, and rendered his State valuable service in framing her new constitution.

He was prominently mentioned by his party for the presidency, and in 1896 and 1904 it is believed that the nomination for Vice President would have been his had he not discouraged the idea.

DANIEL combined those qualities of sterling character, rare fidelity, and faithfulness in the discharge of every duty which justly entitled him to live in the hearts and memories of his countrymen.

His sincerity and uncompromising integrity were never questioned. To devoted patriotism he added sturdy independence, disdaining to calculate consequences. Sustained by conscious rectitude and purity of motive he feared no man, and boldly and openly followed his convictions, seeking to mold and lead public thought, rather than wait to follow it in inglorious safety and popularity.

A worshiper of republican institutions, and an ardent student of its principles, he labored incessantly for means and measures to preserve and perpetuate them. Though an active and conspicuous leader in party strife and excitement, all concur in ascribing to him none but the most patriotic, conscientious, and disinterested motives.

He was singularly charming in manner, amiable, magnetic, and fascinating in public and in private life, and quickly and firmly bound to him for all time in lasting friendship and affection those with whom he came in contact.

DANIEL'S brilliant record as a Confederate soldier, his classic features, his silver tones, and gracious gift of oratory would not alone account for his endearment to his State and people. To these were added the highest ideals, warped by no consideration of selfish interest; truth unquestioned; honor untarnished; courage incomparable; and a civic conscience which he followed unwaveringly. These with his integrity, energy, oratory, and genius are the qualities that for 50 years endeared JOHN DANIEL to his State and his people. He was, indeed, an example of civic virtue as rare as beautiful.

It was well said of him in the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer—

As legislator, Representative, and Senator his service has been conspicuous and brilliant. Senator DANIEL'S fame will rest primarily upon his oratorical gifts. With a culture based upon the widest reading, and a scarcely less wide knowledge of men and affairs, his eloquence was at once simple and irresistibly appealing. No one who ever sat spellbound under the sway of that magnificent voice, rolling forth one noble period after another, is likely to lose the impression received. The topic which elicited his happiest efforts was the "Lost Cause," to which his devotion was most sincere and of which his crutch served as an ever-present reminder. More than one of his memorial addresses have long since taken rank as American classics. For the reason that Senator DANIEL'S voice was so often and so effectively raised in honor of the heroes of the Confederacy, not Virginia alone, but every Commonwealth in Dixie, owes him a debt of gratitude, and throughout the bounds of each his memory will long be fragrant.

And from the Winchester (Va.) Star comes this tribute—

The exact position held by Senator DANIEL in Virginia was unique. The exalted and, indeed, the preeminent place he held in the hearts of Virginians was due to the fact that in him all those qualities which appeal to a chivalrous people were personified. His position and influence is a tribute to the tremendous power of sentiment and the proneness of a generous people to an idealism embodied in the person of a popular hero. His life, his physical presence, his winged words, lent him a glamor which caught and permanently held the imagination of Virginians. His wounded leg, his classic face and beautiful eyes, his voice musical as a flute and eloquent beyond the experience of men, the stainlessness of his life, the gallant front he held against misfortune, gave him a place which no man in the future can hope to fill.

As was very natural, the thoughts of Senator DANIEL turned much to the past. The mighty struggle in which he took so brave a part left an indelible impress upon his memory. The eye of his mind saw through the mist of years the great squadrons set in the field, the ear of his mind heard the thunder of artillery, and in his heart abided the memory of his comrades, living and dead.

The soldier sleeps; the incorruptible statesman has become a memory and example; the good and loving man, whose shoulders were burdened with many honors, has gone to his rest. Virginia mourns, yet in her sorrow there is the proud consciousness that he who was the best loved of all her sons has fought a good fight, and that his life and qualities justified to the full her pride and her affection.

Richly endowed as DANIEL was, and showered with honors and praise, his modesty and freedom from conceit were remarkable. His manners were simple, courtly, charming, giving and commanding deference and respect of mighty and humble alike. Sincere, frank, independent with all; overbearing or flattering to none, no matter what his rank in life might be. The rare charm of putting his listener at ease was his. Whether as host or guest, with rich or poor, mighty or lowly, his manners marked the high-bred, modest gentleman, in whose society it was delightful to be.

One of the crowning virtues in Maj. DANIEL'S character was his loyalty to his friends and his confidence and trust in the people. In his masterful speech on the force bill he emphasized this to a degree. That speech might well have been read and fully digested when two important questions were being discussed in this House a few days ago.

The people of the South, and particularly of Virginia, were greatly impressed and deeply grateful to Senator DANIEL for the noble stand he then took and the ability with which he argued that question, involving, as it did, their welfare and happiness.

I never saw his faith in his people in the least shaken, save on one occasion.

At a Virginia convention I missed him from his usual prominent position on the platform. Fearing he was sick, I visited his room and found him depressed. After talking a short time he turned on me that kindly inquiring expression of his noble countenance that no one will ever forget who enjoyed his confidence and said, "These people expect to defeat me." I replied, "Never; we have 50,000 soldiers left in Virginia. They and 100,000 sons, who have sprung from their loins, love and admire you. You are safe in their hands."

A little son of a Virginia father was about to be punished for some trivial offense. The little fellow looked up pitifully and said: "Father, trust me; I will do so no more." A faithful Confederate officer, who commanded one of the best companies I knew in the army, was asked by the colonel of his regiment how he kept so many men for duty and why they were always so cheerful and ready for the fight. He made this simple reply: "I trust them, and they love me."

The people of Virginia loved JOHN W. DANIEL, and he trusted them. The whole story of his success is told in this sentence.

His death left a vacancy difficult to fill. Other Virginians great and good will occupy the position that he adorned for 30 years. They will measure up to his standard along many lines, no doubt; but the school from which came his equipment, with its ideals, its sacrifices, and tragedies, is closed.

Take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with very great interest to the eloquent addresses of my colleagues on the life and character of the late Senator DANIEL, one of the foremost Virginians of his time. They have spoken of him as a soldier with an enviable record, as a lawyer of conspicuous ability, as an author of great distinction, as an orator of almost matchless grace and brilliancy, as a politician of stainless honor, as a statesman of incorruptible virtue, and as a patriot loyal and devoted to the interests of his State and of his country, and have drawn beautiful pictures of his achievements. It would be exceedingly difficult, therefore, for one who did not know him intimately to add anything to what has already been said of him, and it is not my purpose to attempt it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do desire to read, and thereby help to perpetuate, a most fitting tribute in his memory which appeared in the Virginian-Pilot, a newspaper published in Norfolk, Va., on the morning after his death. This tribute is from the pen of ex-Gov. William E. Cameron, who was his opponent for governor of Virginia, and defeated him, knew him long and intimately, and is, perhaps, as well fitted as any man in the State to make a true estimate of his life and of his character:

JOHN DANIEL.

No public man of his own day and generation has so attracted and held the trusting affection of the Virginia people as JOHN WARWICK DANIEL. Throughout an active career of nearly half a century he has stood conspicuously forward as the exponent of the best sentiment of the Commonwealth, voicing always a spirit of patriotism too deeply founded to be shaken by considerations of selfish interest, and accupying a moral pedestal so high that those who felt constrained at times to take issue with his opinions on political questions were always ready to pay tribute to his sincerity of conviction and purity of motive. His brilliant record as a soldier, his commanding figure and classic face, his mellowness of tongue and grace of gesture, and a gift of oratory which lacked no essential quality of natural grace or cultured finish—all these bespoke for him initial popularity; but neither one nor all of these pleasing attributes would have sufficed to establish and protract his primacy in the public heart through the trying political vicissitudes of so many eventful years, had he been wanting in those elements of character that owe nothing to chance and yield nothing to change—courage unfaltering, truth unquestioning, honor beyond taint or temptation, and a civic conscience as sentitive as that which guided and guarded the conduct of the private gentleman. It was his fortune more than once to run counter to the candidates and policies favored by a majority of his constituents. A lesser man, or one less firmly anchored in the confidence of his fellows, might have abstained from open difference with friends and colleagues; or, having pleaded his views in vain, might have suffered loss of prestige and of following as a consequence. Not so with JOHN DANIEL. He occupied a plane above that of the mere officeholder and politician, and his next reelection to the Senate was marked by the same enthusiastic unanimity which had attended the previous occasion. His people and his party had faith in him. He was not an organizer or a manager of men. What is known as the "machine" side of politics did not appeal to him. But the lack of that which made the strength of other leaders did not constitute a weakness in him. More was expected of him in certain ways than of others similarly placed, and less in other ways. Perhaps that this was true illustrates most perfectly the pedestal on which the esteem and affection of Virginians had elevated JOHN DANIEL. His death leaves a vacancy never to be exactly filled. Other Virginians, some great and some good, will inherit the toga to which he lent dignity for nearly three decades, but the school from which his equipment and his standards were derived is closed, and—

"Take him for all in all, we ne'er shall look upon his like again."

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to avail myself of the privilege of placing in the RECORD a few remarks on the life of Senator JOHN W. DANIEL, of Virginia.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to add my humble words of tribute to the life of the distinguished Senator of our State in whose memory these services are held to-day.

I knew Senator DANIEL well, if not intimately, and his death was to me a personal loss as well as a source of grief to an entire Commonwealth. For a period of over 30 years he had been the most conspicuous figure in the life and politics of our State, though in later years his great powers belonged rather to the Nation than to the State, and I can say that no one occupied a warmer place in the hearts of the Virginia people than did this great orator and statesman.

His death is not only to me a personal loss, but it is a State loss as well, since he left no one to take his place. He was the last, and certainly the best, of that type of statesman and orator that made Virginia famous in the early days of the Republic. The spirit of the early fathers lived and breathed anew in him, and all Virginia felt that in his courtliness of manner, his knightly bearing, and fervid eloquence were reproduced the manners and the life of those who contributed most to the establishment of our national life. It was for this in part that Virginia loved him, and the more reason why Virginians, proud of their illustrious traditions, mourned his death. His legal learning, his genteel manners, his power of speech, and his love of country would have made him a fit compatriot and coworker with Jefferson, with Madison, with Monroe, and with others of that period who have written their names "where time should not efface them and where all men should behold them."

I was drawn to him by his indescribable charm of manner and the goodness of heart and soul that radiated from him in every action he took. I believe all his people felt this way about him. They saw in him a representative of their glorious past, of their own imperishable history, and they loved him, they followed him, and honored him as they have done no other in recent years.

Richly endowed with personal charms, of magnetic, even majestic, presence, classic features, distinguished bearing, he had in his very appearance the power to please. Gifted far beyond the ordinary, both physically and mentally, his restless nature forced him into every conflict, whether of war or peace, in which either his State or his fellow citizens participated.

From the time he shouldered a musket in the defense of his State to the day he breathed his last, a recipient of the highest honor a grateful State could bestow on him, he was a part of every movement in which Virginia was interested.

His life was as varied as were his accomplishments. His versatile mind turned with rapidity from problems of law and jurisprudence to battles in the political field for party supremacy, and thence to a consideration of the great questions affecting the Nation.

His personal career was mainly triumphant. He fought with distinction, was seriously wounded on the field of battle, and his body ever afterwards bore mute testimony of the sacrifice he made for the sake of the lost cause.

Believing with all his heart and soul and mind in the principles of Jeffersonian democracy, he was the unquestioned leader of his party in his State for over a generation. His successes were at times tempered by defeats, but these did not embitter him nor dissuade him from his course. They seemed to inspire him to greater effort, until at last they were crowned with the full measure of success.

As an orator he will be remembered so long as sentiment is a moving cause to human action and the human heart responds to the appeals of pure eloquence. His style was that of a Cicero, copious and grateful, rather than of a Demosthenes, condensed and powerful. In incomparable beauty of language and purity of diction he interpreted the sentiments of his people. He drew from the history of all ages and from every nation and from the lives of great men of every tongue and clime the facts, the examples, the contrasts, the lessons, and the inspiration as from an inexhaustible mental reservoir with which to adorn a subject or point a moral.

Just before Maj. DANIEL entered upon his congressional career and before he became a national figure he represented Virginia as one of the orators on the occasion of the dedication of the Washington Monument. I have been told that as one sentence followed close upon another in this great oration, DANIEL seemed to grow in stature, until he loomed high above things terrestrial, and drew down, from the vaults of the celestial, language comprehensive of his great theme. In one of his eloquent paragraphs he said of the Father of his Country:

> Brilliant I will not call him, if the brightness of the rippling river exceed the solemn glory of Old Ocean. Brilliant I will not call him, if darkness must be visible in order to display the light; for he had none of that rocket-like brilliance which flames in instant coruscation across the black brow of night, and then is not. But if a steady, unflickering flame, slow rising to its lofty sphere, high hung in the heavens of contemplation, dispensing far and wide its rays, revealing all things on which it shines in the proportions and large relations, making right, duty, and destiny so plain that in the vision we are scarce conscious of the light—if this be brilliancy—then the genius of Washington was as full orbed and luminous as the god of day in his zenith.

And his peroration! It breathed the very soul of patriotism and rose to the highest pinnacle of true eloquence. I will only quote a part of it:

> Long live the United States of America, filled with the free, magnanimous spirit, crowned by the wisdom, blessed by the moderation, hovered over by the guardian angel of Washington's example; may they ever be worthy in all things to be defended by the blood of the brave, who know the rights of man and shrink not from their assertion; may they each be a column, and altogether, under the Constitution, a perpetual temple of peace, unshadowed by a Cæsar's palace, at whose altar may freely commune all who seek the union of liberty and brotherhood.

Thenceforth DANIEL took his rightful place, not alone as Virginia's greatest orator, but as belonging to the whole Nation.

He was not only a gifted orator, but a profound lawyer, a leader of the bar, and an author of great distinction. The whole realm of law was explored by him, and in this vast theater his abilities had full play. Whether as advocate or defender in the common-law causes or as expounder or interpreter of the Federal Constitution, he was a distinguished authority. Practitioners at every bar, as well as students of the common law, in the years to come know and will know JOHN WARWICK DANIEL for the legacies he left to the profession when he contributed to the bibliography of law the volumes entitled "Daniel on Negotiable Instruments" and "Daniel on Attachments." And the pages of congressional history will more than once be consulted, and interpretations by DANIEL of constitutional questions be quoted as furnishing high authority.

As a statesman it was given to few men as it was to DANIEL the influence and power to exercise the mastery over and to control the destinies of the people of a great Commonwealth as he exercised and controlled affairs in the State of Virginia. The people of that State were his willing followers. They loved and trusted him. They saw in him the reincarnation of illustrious sons who had made Virginia famous in the Nation's history. No honor within their gift was too great to bestow upon him. They chose him to represent them in high and exalted places—in both houses of the legislature, in constitutional conventions, in the National House, and in the United States Senate, in Democratic State and National conventions, and but for political exigencies and conditions would probably have been nominated by his party for Chief Executive of the Nation.

The constitution of Virginia, many of its laws, much of the common-law practice of its courts, and the government of its municipalities reflect the judgment, the learning, and the wisdom of JOHN W. DANIEL. Under his leadership, by his wise counsel and advice, his party in Virginia stood for the last quarter of a century true to the traditions and tenets of democracy as interpreted by national platforms, in the construction of whose planks DANIEL was a potential factor. In the nature of things he left the impress of his magnetic personality and his rare genius upon the warp and woof of Virginia's social, political, and industrial life. That this can not also be said of him in its fullness as a national figure is due alone to the vicissitudes of the Democratic Party and to the limitations of the opportunities offered him in the wider field of national politics and not to the lack of anything in him that would have made for success if political conditions had been favorable for the crystallization of party principles into public policy. Yet, notwithstanding his political environment, hostile and uncongenial as it was throughout the greater part of his service in Congress, DANIEL wielded a tremendous influence in the shaping of legislation during two decades of service in the Senate.

He was a State rights Democrat and for a strict construction of the Constitution, not in the narrow, circumscribed sense that the terms might imply, but broadly, reasonably, in the light of that deep study to which he had given the subject. The line of demarcation between the powers of the several States and the powers of the National Government was plain to him, and he defined and elucidated those powers with a distinctness and clearness of diction that carried conviction. He was as zealous in preserving the one as the other, and in this showed a degree of statesmanship that lifted him far above the plane of partisanship and provincialism and stamped him as a safe, sound, and wise publicist, who would insist upon the sovereignty of the Nation as well as of the States. This was best exemplified in the great Chicago strike, when President Cleveland, without response to an invitation from the governor of the State of Illinois, sent troops to quell the riots so that the United States mails could pass.

Maj. DANIEL sustained the action of the President and, in support of a resolution indorsing his action, said, in part, as follows:

> Mr. President, I had hoped that such a resolution as this in a time of public peril like that which now confronts us would pass the Senate without objection, without delay, without debate.
> There are some things which go without saying, and it should go without saying that this is not a matter on which parties may fairly divide. He who brings in the name of party in a partisan sense, whether it be Republican, Democratic, or Populist, forgets due recognition of his duty as a patriot.
> In this resolution I have simply summarized the provisions of the Constitution which bear directly on the existing situation, and which point the pathway of duty to the President; and I have given expression to that sense of approbation of his course which pervades all classes of thinking and patriotic citizens.
> I am a State rights Democrat, who would not like to see the muniments of local self-government overridden. But I am also a national Democrat, who would not like to see the muniments of national authority and national safety destroyed.
> Anarchy is no remedy for anything. It intensifies every evil that exists. It impedes every remedial process. It should be stamped out wherever it shows itself.
> The President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He has the plain right, and it is his plain duty, to employ them whenever and wherever the Constitution and laws of the Federal Government are forcibly resisted by combinations of men.
> The establishment of post offices and post roads and the transportation of the mails through and by them is a Federal matter. Commerce among the States—interstate commerce, as distinguished from local intrastate commerce—is a Federal matter.
> The due process of law in the Federal courts is a Federal matter. And in all three of these matters the President, having imposed upon him the constitutional obligation to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," has the right to use the Army and Navy to that end, and to oppose force by force.
> I am the friend, and have often been the champion, of those who work for their daily bread. My sympathy is with them. But they can have no lot or share with anarchists, the destroyers of property, the destroyers of life, the breakers of law, the enemies of peace, order, and civilized existence. They have no place in the ranks of incendiaries, and they have no enemy who can be so fatal to their every interest as those who seek to fire them into defiance of law.
> The President is right in dealing promptly with lawbreakers. He ought to be upheld and cordially, and unstintedly supported here, as he will be throughout this land, by upright and law-abiding citizens.
> Sections and parties disappear in the face of society imperiled. We should know only the country, the Constitution, and the laws; and, as the President says, in such an emergency discussion may be well postponed. Peace, order, and obedience to law are the conditions precedent to discussion; with them assured, grievances will be heard, rights protected, and wrongs redressed.

These are words of a statesman and patriot. Rising above the political conditions of that hour, unmindful of the effect upon his own or his party's future, Senator DANIEL was for upholding the arm of the Federal Government for the protection of life and property against a condition of anarchy which supine and indifferent, if not to say sympathetic, State authorities made no serious attempt to suppress.

While he was distinguished in so many lines of useful endeavor, as orator, statesman, soldier, scholar, and lawyer, he was preeminent as a Christian gentleman. His was the atmosphere of benignity, self-effacement, and Christian charity. It has been said by one of his admirers that his Christian nature and his fighting spirit were combined compatibly.

While I did not belong to his political party nor look upon national problems from the same point of view as he did, yet I always regarded him as a valiant and an honorable foe. Our differences were never mentioned, and I entertained for him the warmest personal regard. I have seen him on the hustings proclaiming the principles of his party; I have listened to his matchless eloquence in paying tribute to a departed comrade; I have gone with him in presenting matters to the President of the United States; and I have observed him in the great intellectual forum where he spent so many years of his useful life. Under all the circumstances he was the same calm, dignified man, considerate of the wishes of others, powerful in argument, and persuasive in speech. I feel the better for having known him. I feel the better for what he was and for what he is. What is mortal of him has returned to the dust from which he was formed, but his immortal soul, the life of the man himself—that which moved and lived and had its being here—still lives, and will live through eternity. In this he believed, in this I believe, without which belief we are of all men miserable.

For his character and example and greatness among men; for the hand of cordial friendship and good will held out to me when first I came a stranger to these Halls; for the sake of my revered father, who served in the Confederacy at the same time as Maj. DANIEL; for his gallantry in the vanquished cause of the Southland; and for his lofty, patriotic love for our common and reunited country I honor and revere his memory.

May he rest from his labors, and may his works follow him.

Mr. LAMB assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the flower which I would lay upon the tomb of Senator DANIEL is the forget-me-not, the emblem of enduring affection. I knew him well; I esteemed him most highly; I cherished for him a sentiment that was closer than esteem and partook of the attributes of sacred confidence and warm personal affection.

When I entered the Virginia Legislature a youth of 22 years he was a United States Senator from Virginia and was my friend, my counselor, and adviser. From that day to the hour when his enfranchised spirit entered that undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns my relations with him were close. I was his devoted follower and admirer, and I have grieved deeply at the loss which I sustained in his death.

It is, Mr. Speaker, indeed a tribute to our better nature to be grieved when our friends depart from among the living. Our humanity would not be worth the having without this attribute; but as we stand by the graves of our friends we are comforted by the counsel of the Holy Writ, "Not to sorrow for them that are asleep even as those who have no hope."

We all, sir, have our natural ambitions to act well our parts among our fellows; we are emulous to do our State some service, but there are few of us whose best and supremest aspiration is not to leave the world a little darkened at our departure. Senator DANIEL'S death caused widespread sorrow in his State and in this Nation. When the wires flashed the sad tidings a pall of gloom was cast over the entire State of Virginia and that pall has not yet been lifted. No son of Virginia among all the splendid galaxy of her great men was more universally loved in life or more deeply mourned in death. The people of Virginia loved him because he loved them. They were true to him because he was true to them. They honored him because in so doing they honored themselves.

JOHN WARWICK DANIEL was born in the city of Lynchburg, Va., on September 5, 1842. His home was in that city and on his farm on its outskirts during his entire life. He came of a long line of distinguished people. His grandfather, William Daniel, sr., was a lawyer of great ability and one of the most magnetic and brilliant debaters and orators Virginia has produced. His father, William Daniel, jr., was a distinguished lawyer, and for years was a member of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. His mother was of the noted Warwick family.

He was educated in the private schools of Lynchburg, at the Lynchburg College, and the Gessner Harrison School, of Nelson, and after the war studied law at the University of Virginia, where he distinguished himself in the classroom and in the debating society. A commencement oration—"The People"—delivered while a student at this institution sent him forth into the world a marked and distinguished man.

While he was at the school of Prof. Harrison the Virginia ordinance of secession was passed. There was no hesitation on the part of the young student of 18 to go with his State in her ultimate decision. As soon as the call of Virginia rang out through the hills and valleys of the old Commonwealth, summoning her sons to her defense, the first among the foremost to rally to her side was this ardent schoolboy. As a soldier he was distinguished for reckless courage, an accurate knowledge of military affairs, and for untiring and loyal devotion to every duty imposed upon him. He was a private, a second lieutenant, a first lieutenant, and a major and chief of staff of Gen. Jubal A. Early. He was wounded five times, three times at the first battle of Manassas, again at Boonsboro, Md.; and at the Wilderness, on May 6, 1864, while gallantly leading the charge of the Thirty-third Regiment of the old Stonewall Brigade, he received the cruel wound which sent him limping through life and darkened all of his days with suffering and pain. There on the blood-stained field, when full high rolled the crimson tide of battle, he fell, a hero, while his comrades swept on to victory. This wound ended his military service, and but for this fact it is believed that he would have been made a brigadier general soon after the Battle of the Wilderness, and that his military career would have been as brilliant as in subsequent years his career in civil life was.

But, Mr. Speaker, it was not alone in the times which tried men's souls that the patriotism and devotion of Senator DANIEL to Virginia was conspicuous. When the war was over and unprincipled adventurers from without and renegades from within came like a pestilence to blight the small remnants we had left from the sword and torch, he was the leader in the defense of the heritage and institutions of his people.

Amid the anarchy of the reconstruction period, down through all the great struggles for the supremacy of virtue and intelligence in the control of our Government, and for the preservation of society and Anglo-Saxon civilization to 1902, when this danger to these was swept away by a constitution germinating in the hearts of the Virginia people and fashioned by a convention of their own choosing, it was he who stood forth as Virginia's greatest champion.

Though left by the storms of war with body broken and fortunes spent, yet in every struggle between Virginia and her foes, foreign or domestic, he was always on the firing line, and with voice and mind and means aggressively maintained her cause.

For 30 years he was the undisputed leader of the Virginia Democracy, and the most prominent figure in our party conventions; and in addition to this, he was the most beloved citizen of the State. This love for Senator DANIEL was confined to no particular sections, but from where the billowy Atlantic washes our eastern front, to the lofty ridge which receives its name from the bending heavens that bathes its summits in their own soft blue, and beyond to where the Cumberland Range marks our remotest western border; everywhere the citizens of Virginia vied with one another in unbounded admiration and love for the noble gentleman, the maimed Confederate soldier, the brilliant orator, the profound constitutional lawyer, the sound statesman, whom they delighted to acknowledge as their unchallenged leader.

STATESMANSHIP.

Senator DANIEL early entered public life. He served in the Virginia House of Delegates from 1869 to 1871, in the State Senate from 1875 to 1881, and in the constitutional convention of Virginia of 1901–2. His service in these bodies was brilliant and was productive of much good legislation. He was the author of the franchise provision of the present constitution of the State, and its adoption was secured by reason of his great influence with the convention. Through his service in these bodies his constructive statesmanship was woven into the very warp and woof of the laws of his native State. He served two years in this body and 23 years at the other end of the Capitol as a Senator from Virginia, and at the time of his death, though he had not served out his fourth term, he had been reelected for a fifth term. For years he was one of the great members of the Committees on Foreign Relations, Appropriations and Finance of the Senate, and was potential in the settlement of all matters affecting our relations with foreign countries and the appropriations and revenues of this Government. His ability as a debater and his complete knowledge of public questions made him a leading figure on the floor of the Senate, and gained him a national reputation which gave him in the minds of the public the place he so well deserved, as one of the greatest of American statesmen. He was for years prominent in the Democratic national conventions, and was influential in shaping the policies of that party.

LAWYER.

Senator DANIEL was a great and learned lawyer. When 25 years of age he published a work on "Attachments," which is to-day found in every well-equipped law library in Virginia, and later on he published a work on "Negotiable Instruments," in two large volumes, which is constantly quoted by the courts of last resort, both in this country and in England. For years he had a large practice in the State and Federal courts of Virginia and in the Supreme Court of the United States. Whether in the trial or appellate court, he was always ready. He was thorough in the preparation and magnificent in the presentation of a case. Some of his most powerful and impassioned speeches were at the bar when a question of law or evidence was unexpectedly sprung and when there was no opportunity for premeditation or special preparation. In these passages he often reached an altitude of oratory and fierce invective that has not been surpassed since the great Roman orator drove Cataline in consternation from the Senate, or when Pericles brought the display of Athenian eloquence to its highest pinnacle of splendor.

ORATOR.

He was one of Virginia's great orators. That beautiful creation of his mind and heart, the oration on Lee delivered at Lexington in 1883, had he no other monument to his genius, would mark him as one of the foremost orators of his generation. It is one of the masterpieces of our language, which will live for ages, yielding an inspiration to higher and nobler aspirations. Scores of triumphs nearly as great as this mark his career. His orations covered a wide field and are read with delight to-day by thousands. His oratory was of the richer style of the old school and always delighted and enchanted his hearers.

It is not easy, Mr. Speaker, to decide in the display of his magnificent powers whether in the forensic field or in the arena of oratory our admiration is the more excited; for by a rare combination he may be said to have united in his splendid personality the encomiums which Cicero divided between the two most distinguished citizens of Rome when he declared the one to be the orator most learned in the law and the other the lawyer most renowned for oratory.

Senator DANIEL was warm in his friendships, and not only had very devoted admirers, but there were many who, in the words employed by Ben Johnson toward the Bard of Avon, "loved him to idolatry," and this was largely because they believed so implicitly in his integrity and his loyalty to his convictions. In a day when the commercial spirit threatened to dominate our land, it was pleasant to turn to this thoughtful figure, this idealist, whose dreams and aspirations were not controlled by the pulsations of the stock market nor measured by the stunted standard of present successes. His voice never delivered an uncertain sound.

Such, Mr. Speaker, in meager outline was the career of Senator DANIEL. It was indeed a high and a fine career of service to mankind, than which there is nothing higher beneath the circuit of the sun. Such aims and ends constitute the only real royalty, for—

> Herein stands the office of a king,
> His honor, virtue, merit, and chief praise,
> That for the public all this weight he bears;
> Yet he who reigns within himself and rules
> Passions, desires, and fears is more than king.

No questionable act ever marked the fair pages of his private or public life. He stood in the fierce light which beats against the throne, but no flaw was ever found in his armor through which the shafts of envy and slander could enter and wound his fame. He was gentle yet strong, courteous yet brave, ready to extend the soft hand of charity and grasp with comprehensive thought the great questions of government and law. It is of such a man that the greatest of ancient philosophers affirmed—

> The man of great soul is one who accounts himself worthy of great things, being worthy.

How far removed from this noble aphorism is the wretched plaint of Solomon:

> Surely man at his best estate is vanity.

Mr. Speaker, man at his best estate is thrilled with intimations of immortality. Death to a man like Senator DANIEL is but a shadow cast by his transition to loftier activities—

> He is not dead but sleepeth; well we know
> The form that now lies mute beneath the sod
> Shall rise when time the golden bugles blow
> And pour their music through the courts of God.

In his essay upon death Lord Bacon has pictured that of Senator DANIEL:

> He that dies in an earnest pursuit is like one that is wounded in hot blood; who for the time scarce feels the hurt, and therefore a mind fixed and bent upon somewhat that is good doth divert the troubles of death. Death hath this also, that it openeth the gate to good fame and extinguisheth envy.

Mr. Speaker, during the dreadful Sepoy mutiny in India, when the English garrison in Lucknow, with the women and children, was beleaguered by its ferocious and merciless foes, and the fate of the Cawnpore seemed staring them in the face, a cry was heard from the little Scotch lassie, Jeannie Brown: "Dinna ye hear the pibroch; dinna ye hear the slogan!" Her eager and alert ear had caught from afar the sound of the bagpipes in the approaching army of Sir Colin Campbell.

And so, while our hearts are attuned to sorrow that a life fraught with so much good should be cut off from among us, our chastened reflections can discern echoes of counsel and encouragement from his life which should animate us all to a renewed and higher consecration to worthy and unselfish devotion to our country and our kind. And whilst among the perplexities of this world we "can not always see the way," we can all become better and stronger from the example of such a life; and with pride and gratitude for such a career, we can cry to our Father and his Father:

> Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief,
> And grant Thy servant such a life and death.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who desire to do so may have leave to print remarks on Senator DANIEL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who desire to do so may have leave to print remarks on Senator DANIEL. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the resolution previously agreed to, the House adjourned until Monday, June 26, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill, House bill 4412.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I give notice that on Wednesday, June 28, immediately following the routine morning business, I will address the Senate upon the pending bill, with special reference to the amendments I have proposed to it.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I understand that the subject for discussion before the Senate to-day is what is known as the Root amendment to the Canadian agreement. I think it is generally known by this body that I am opposed to the Canadian treaty or agreement in its present form. On the very day after the agreement was sent to the Senate by the President of the United States I wrote to Louisiana, stating that in my opinion some provisions of the agreement operated as an unjust discrimination against the agricultural interests of some sections of this country, and for that reason, if for no other, I could not support it in the shape in which it was presented. Before I went home after the adjournment of the Congress my position on that subject was well known to several of my brother Democratic Senators and possibly to one or two Republican Senators.

As soon as I reached New Orleans in March after the adjournment of Congress I was interviewed on the subject by a reporter of one of the leading New Orleans daily papers, and I then stated my opposition to the agreement and gave the reasons why I could not support it, adding, however, that if it was amended so as to do away with the injustice that I thought would be done by its provisions to the agriculturists of the country, I should very willingly support it. A few days after that I was interviewed in north Louisiana by a reporter of one of the leading papers in that section of the State, and I then reiterated the views I had already expressed, and added that as these were my convictions no amount of criticism could swerve me from carrying them out. So my position on the subject has been for several months thoroughly understood by the people of Louisiana.

Now, as to the pending Root amendment, I must confess that I do not very clearly understand that proposition, except that neither its adoption nor its rejection will have any effect on the reciprocity bill so far as relates to its being accepted by the Dominion of Canada. There seems to be a very serious disagreement among lawyers in this body as to what its effect might be, but out of the somewhat foggy atmosphere that pervades the subject to me at least I do seem to see that the measure is calculated on one point, not a very important point either, in my opinion, to correct an inequality in the bill whereby the citizens of the United States would be put on a fairer plane with the citizens of the Dominion of Canada than they are without it; and believing as I do that through the provisions of this treaty the Dominion of Canada is receiving far more advantage than the United States will be receiving from it, and as I do not wish to give the Dominion of Canada any assistance in the way of getting any greater advantages from the treaty over the United States than it is already receiving, I shall vote in favor of the Root amendment, unless my views are changed by the further discussion that will happen to-day. In voting that way I do it with a perfect knowledge that the amendment is doomed to defeat, but the knowledge of the success or defeat of a pending measure before this body can not of course have the slightest influence on me in the matter of my vote upon it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I for one shall vote for the Root amendment, not for the reason urged by some of the Members of the Senate that they desire to make the bill as bad as possible, but because I am opposed to the bill, and if it has to become a law I desire to make it as good as possible.

I have yet to hear one reason urged upon this floor why the Root amendment should not be adopted. The only statement I have heard either in public or private, the only reason urged, is that the bill must be passed without amendment as it came from the House. That is not a conclusive argument to my mind as a Republican. That a Republican Senate must take a bill prepared and passed by a Democratic House in the face of the opposition of a majority of the Republicans in the House, and must pass it without amendment, I say is not a conclusive or even a persuasive argument to my mind.

When the Senate shall so far forget its duty to the public, when the Senate shall so far lose its respect for itself as to say that it will not amend a bill for good when it comes before this body, then the Senate is simply to become an echo and to lack power in the affairs of the Government. That, for one, I am unwilling to do. There are Senators upon this floor who believe that the Root amendment is a proper amendment and yet hesitate to place it upon this bill. Their reason I can not imagine.

I am for the Root amendment, because, to my mind, it affords the only loophole of excuse for the passage of this bill. It at least assumes some degree of reciprocity. I am for the Root amendment because it gives some relief from section 2 of the bill, which, as presented, flies directly in the face of every Republican utterance that has been made by the Republican Party in reference to the tariff. Section 2 provides for the free admission of paper and wood pulp. We are urged that we must not meddle with the wool schedule, that we must not meddle with the steel schedule, that we must not touch the sugar schedule, because the Republicans, by solemn act, have provided for a Tariff Board that will look into the wisdom of these various schedules as they now are, and shall set forth the facts that they find in connection with the industry, and that no legislation on these subjects should be had until such board has investigated and reported; and the last utterance of the Republican Party, written into the platform at the suggestion, or at least with the active and earnest cooperation of the Senator from Massachusetts in the subcommittee which prepared that platform in Chicago, was that the Republican Party believed in the protective tariff; that they believed the measure of protection should be the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, with a reasonable profit to the manufacturer. The only schedule in the tariff upon which that Tariff Board has made a report, the only light that they have given us upon this whole tariff question, has been in reference to the schedule that is mentioned in section 2 of this bill.

What is it that is proposed by some of the so-called regular Republicans in this Chamber? To fly in the face of the report of that board. That board reports the difference between the cost of production in Canada and the cost of production in the United States of print paper to be something over $5 a ton. Section 2—I do not wonder it is in the bill, because it comes from a body that does not believe in a protective tariff, that does not believe that it is for the best interests of the country so to adjust ourselves as to have any protection in our tariff bills—section 2 flies in the face of that well-considered report; flies in the face of the action of the Republican Congress in giving credit to that board, and absolutely flies in the face of the last definite utterance on the tariff by the Republican platform of two years ago.

I am in favor of the Root amendment as a Republican, because it takes a little of the sting out of section 2. The Root amendment does provide that when Canadian print paper shall come into this country free, reciprocally our paper shall go into Canada free.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, would the Senator mind a little inquiry right there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator know of anything produced in the United States which, after this bill shall become a law, will, under the rules of trade, go into Canada free?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know of nothing.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, then, if the Senator——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, the opportunity is there if the product is there.

Mr. McCUMBER. The opportunity is there, but the conditions of trade are such that none of our products would go into Canada free.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, can not the Senator see, then, that by adopting this amendment he would spoil the present beautiful symmetry of the compact?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not want to spoil it, but I want to mar it a bit.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Would it mar it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, I think so. It is now distinctly Democratic. I want to put a little Republicanism into it.

Mr. CLAPP. Has the Senator from Wyoming investigated so as to ascertain how much paper, pulp, and wood combined were shipped into Canada from this country last year?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I have not investigated that. I have not been interested in it very much, because I do not believe it would be enough to found an argument on.

Mr. CLAPP. That is just the point with reference to this amendment. While it proposes to give reciprocity, it is dealing with a subject that the veriest novice knows, because of economic conditions, we never can get reciprocity in.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not a novice, then, because I do not know it.

Mr. CLAPP. But the Senator just admitted practically that he had not sufficient interest as to our capacity to ship these products into Canada to even have investigated it. Speaking now from memory, we got $300,000 worth of those articles into their market, against $4,000,000 they got into ours.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is substantially correct. I should not be surprised if the discrepancy were greater, but I am not making this argument, as I stated before, on the ground that we are going to benefit very much by the Root amendment. I am making it on the ground that I do not want to entirely throw overboard every Republican doctrine contained in the tariff proposition, and this does give a loophole, so that if our industry should increase, if the market should be afforded, and if Canada should become a depot for the entrance of our paper, so that we will have the opportunity, we can take advantage of it and get in. Without the Root amendment we can not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I understood the Senator correctly, he said the bill is now Democratic?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Absolutely.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think, if we put the Root amendment on, it will be un-Democratic?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it will have a little Republican leaven in it. Does the Senator from North Carolina believe that to put the Root amendment on would keep it Democratic?

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, we will discuss that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator evades that question.

Mr. President, so far as section 2 is concerned, I think everyone agrees that it is not a part of the reciprocal arrangement, so called, between Canada and this country; it is not a part of the agreement that was entered into by the ministers of Canada and the representatives of the United States.

I had formed an idea of exactly what this section meant with the Root amendment, but I was somewhat shaken in my individual conclusions by the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in this Chamber two or three days ago. Whatever we may think of it, however, we must conclude, and it is acknowledged, that section 2 of this bill does not carry out the agreement between the two countries; it is not the compact that was sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator observes that he was somewhat shaken in his convictions by the argument of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. He immediately follows that with the statement that everybody concedes that the Root amendment is in conformity with the agreement.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad if I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I did not say that. I said that I was somewhat shaken in regard to it.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Wyoming argued emphatically that it violated the agreement.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no. I did the Senator from Iowa the credit to say that he had shaken me somewhat in my former belief; but I went on to say that section 2, as it comes from the House, is not in any event the agreement that was entered into between this country and Canada.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. If it was in conformity with the agreement, then the Senator would be heartily in favor of the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not at all. I am against it from soda to hoc, right straight through the whole bill. I do not want my position misunderstood. But if we have got to have this bill enacted into law, I want to make it as good as I can.

Mr. BROWN. If it is in harmony with the original agreement, the Senator is for it; and he is against it if it is contrary to the agreement. Is that the position the Senator takes?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does not the Senator yet understand my position?

Mr. BROWN. I am trying to understand the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am against the reciprocity agreement——

Mr. BROWN. The Root amendment is in conflict with the reciprocity agreement——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator wait? I am against the reciprocity agreement; but if the Republicans in this Chamber are going to make it so that I have got to take it, I want to make it as good as I can; and I believe the Root amendment betters it. That is my position.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator yield again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, yes.

Mr. BROWN. I do not care to interrupt the Senator, but I should like to get his viewpoint, if I can. The Senator now, as I understand, is in favor of the Root amendment because it puts Republicanism into the pact?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Because it helps the bill.

Mr. BROWN. Now, the Senator is aware of the fact, is he not, that the author of the amendment himself stated on the floor here that, with his amendment adopted, there would be no change in the practical effect and result of existing law so far as free print paper is concerned?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am aware of the fact that the Senator from New York looks on his child with not quite so much love as I look at it.

Mr. BROWN. I am not speaking of love; I am speaking of the effect of his own amendment, which the Senator from New York says will leave the law as it is so far as the real result is concerned.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is the Senator speaking accurately? Does he mean the law or the bill?

Mr. BROWN. The law—that it will leave the law as it is; that the result will be the same as under existing law—that is, we should still have the present duties on print paper and spruce wood with the Root amendment adopted, and there would be no reduction either on this side of the boundary line or the other, because the condition the Root amendment puts into the law leaves the practical result just as it is to-day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. BROWN. Well, the author of the amendment does.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The author of the amendment, perhaps, does not view his child with the same eyes that I do. But, Mr. President, I have seen no real demand, or any demand well-seated in reason, for the enactment of any part of this bill. I see still less demand for the enactment of section 2, because, as I have said before, nobody contends for a moment that section 2 is a reciprocal provision.

There is just one interest that asks for section 2, and that is the interest that has assaulted in favor of free paper every Republican tariff that has been formulated in the Chambers of Congress for the last 15 years. That is the interest that appeared before the Republican national convention in Chicago and the Democratic national convention in Denver; that is the interest that in season and out of season, contrary to all Republican doctrine, contrary to every spirit of fairness in our industrial affairs, has demanded free print paper.

It was urged in the hearings, it has even been spoken in public utterances by those high in authority, that the crusade amongst the farmers against this pact had its birthplace amongst a band of promoters in New York; that, in fact, the farmers are not conscious as to whether or not they are interested vitally in this matter; that they do not know what they are talking about; and that all their opposition has been caused, as I have said, by a band of promoters in New York. That is the medicine that has been sedulously sent out by those in favor of free print paper; but the same hearings developed the fact that substantially all the crusade in favor of the reciprocity agreement has been conducted by the great users of print paper in metropolitan centers, which have been groomed and prepared for the race by the American Publishers' Association. I say that without fear of contradiction.

The American Publishers' Association, the membership of which is to be saved $6,000,000, according to their own figures, if this bill goes through, do not care what becomes of this reciprocity agreement so long as section 2 remains in it inviolate. When you talk of a hothouse propaganda, here we have one. By their own admission before the committee, a man is paid $15,000 a year for this very purpose, and a telegram was sent out to the newspapers by the president of that association, which virtually controls the daily news of this country, "Please see to it that your correspondents in Washington are instructed to treat favorably the reciprocity measure, because it provides for free print paper." That same bureau has been sending out articles addressed to the farmers, articles addressed to each State, playing upon their selfish interests. These things are all published in the hearings. So that if I am opposed to the bill as a whole, I am still more opposed to section 2, unless it be amended in the reciprocal method for which the Root amendment provides.

I am not going to discuss the peciprocity bill; but I want to make a few inquiries of my political colleagues upon this side of the Chamber. It is no surprise to me that the Democratic Party as a whole are in favor of this measure; it is no surprise that, with two of three notable exceptions, the vote will be practically unanimous upon the other side of the Chamber, as it was upon the Democratic side of the House of Representatives, and why? Because it is a thing that they have been hoping for; it is a thing that they believe in; it is a thing that they want to write upon the statute books of this Nation in conformity with their tariff policy for 50 years.

The Democratic Party in the Senate are absolutely consistent in their opposition, and they are the only ones that can claim any credit if good shall follow the enactment of this bill. The Republican Party is openly divided in this Chamber upon this proposition; and to my unutterable surprise I find those who through sunshine and in storm have advocated the Republican doctrine of protection, Senators from New England whose prosperity is built upon a protective tariff, are the first ones to desert the doctrine of protection in this bill. They were the first ones who taught the country that the tariff was not a local issue; they were the ones who appealed to the farmers of your State, sir [the Vice President in the chair], and to the farmers in other States to uphold the doctrine, because it was a great national blessing, the benefits of which directly or indirectly found their way into every household in the land; and year after year the farmers of the Northwest, of North Dakota and South Dakota and Minnesota and Iowa and other States have marched up with their Republican majorities—majorities founded and claimed almost substantially entirely upon the idea of a protective tariff and upon the idea that it was not a local issue.

When our Democratic friends upon the stump and elsewhere have gone before the people of the country and have said to the people of those States, "Republican protection is a fraud; it fattens the manufacturer; it fattens New England; but you are paying for it," men who in this Chamber and elsewhere have heretofore been the strongest supporters of protection are the first ones to strike a blow at the idea that a Republican protective tariff is uniform in its operation, and they say in this bill, "We will make the tariff a local issue." They take up the discarded theory, even, of the Democratic Party in Hancock's time, that the tariff is a local issue, and they come into this Chamber and say, "We will make it a local issue; we will strip from the farmers of the Central and Northwestern States all benefit they can possibly derive in their vocation from the operation of the tariff. We will confine it to the manufacturer."

I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts—I want to ask other New England Senators in this body who are going to vote for this pact—whether they vote for it because they believe that Republican doctrine as it has been taught by the Republican Party all these years has been a delusion and a snare? What answer are you going to make to your constituents when the time shall come and they look back upon the vote in this Chamber on this bill and say to you, "By that vote you laid the ax to the root of the tree of our tariff prosperity?" Because, just as sure as the sun shines, this free-trade doctrine in the Republican Party will not stop now. I view this with the utmost alarm. I do not believe in reprisals; I do not believe in revenge; and it will take even more than this legislation to make me waver in my political faith in Republican protection. But, just as sure as the sun shines, the manufacturers of New England can not hope to escape the results of thus making the tariff a local issue.

It was said by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in this Chamber the other day that while in his belief the farmers of this country had not as yet received much benefit from the protective tariff, in his opinion, as the point of our national consumption approached the point of production the farmer would receive some benefit.

We know from what we have heard in this Chamber, from what we have heard on this floor, that that point is now reached; and you, my Republican friends of New England, you whom we of the West have stood for through thick and thin during these 30 or 40 years, you say to us, you say to the millions of farmers, "Just as soon as we see that protection is protecting you, that instant we will wipe it from the statute books, but we will leave untouched the protection which we have enjoyed through your assistance and favor for lo these many years."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I hope the Senator from Wyoming does not include all the New England Senators.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was especially careful not to. I said, or intended to say, those of the New England Senators who were going to vote for this pact.

I am not unconscious of the fact that the West owes largely to the manufacturing States; I am not unconscious of the fact that the manufacturing States of New England have stood through evil report and good report for the Republican protective tariff; and that is what amazes me all the more that in this time when by the mutations of human politics the opposing party has already acquired control of the other portion of Congress, when the assaults are thickest and the hardest upon this doctrine of protection, when the enemy is in force, when they are equipped, when they are ready and eager for the fray, when they have already captured the outworks and are now training their guns against the citadel itself, that the first men to desert the cause are the men who for years and years have stood like adamant against the heresy of free trade; and free trade is no longer something that can be laughed at.

In times past when we have made our campaigns we have been met by the opposition saying, "the tariff is no longer an issue. No one is in favor of free trade." And yet upon this floor, within this debate, we have three distinguished Senators on the Democratic side rising and saying "we are against protection in any form or in any phase. We do not want even the incidental protection, and we want the tariff laid so that not only will it not be a protective tariff, but we want it laid without even incidental protection entering into it." If that is not free trade, then free trade has never had utterance in the political history of this Nation.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Wyoming has stated that this Canadian tariff bill was in harmony with the dreams and hopes of the Democratic Party for years. I believe in being fair. There are Democrats who are in favor, perhaps, of this kind of a tariff bill. But in my reading of Democratic utterances upon the tariff—and I know it is negatived by the positive declarations of some members of that party in the Senate——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. They are the ones to whom I referred in my exceptions.

Mr. CLAPP. So it is hardly fair to say that a measure that had its origin in the interest of great combinations, that ignores the producer and consumer and simply strengthens the hands of recognized trusts—I hardly think it is fair to say—is in harmony with Democratic purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to be perfectly fair to the Democratic Party, but I want to put it so that they will understand that I am not flirting with them. Mr. President, the only utterance I have heard in favor of this pact—I have heard none upon the Republican side—is from the Democratic side, that they are for this pact because it is "a step in the right direction."

Do not, my Republican friends, think for a moment that this crusade against our protective tariff is going to stop here. It is not going to stop until one of two things happens; either that the assailants of the policy are repulsed as field after field is fought—and this bill is the first skirmish—or until the very corner stone of the protective system is in ruins; and it is for the Republican Party in this Senate to say which shall be the result.

You, my Republican friends, the stalwarts, the standpatters, who believe in party discipline, who believe that the greatest good can only come by united action, you who believe that the progressives have been wrong in their statements that they did not care to be bound by a conference or a caucus, you who believe that they have strayed far from the way—are you willing to go into a conference with the Republican Members of this Senate to-day and abide by the outspoken views of the majority of that conference upon this reciprocity pact? Are you? If you are, I for one am willing to abide by the result of such a conference. I for one am willing to abide by the regulars and insurgents together in this body as to what they shall say and as to what shall be the expression of the party in this Chamber upon this policy.

Aye, I will go further, my Republican friends, you with whom I have been associated for many years in this Chamber, we who have fought the battles together as best we could. I am willing that the regular Republicans in this Chamber shall settle by their unbiased and uninfluenced vote what shall be the policy of the party in this Chamber in regard to this pact. I ask any Republican Senator who is going to vote for it, I ask any Republican Senator, either insurgent or progressive or regular, wherein in any part of the history of our party, wherein in any utterance of those who blazed the way in the doctrines of our party, you will find any justification of any sort for the vote you propose to cast in favor of this bill?

It is one of the most singular political positions. Senators are going to vote—so I am told; I hope they will not—for this measure because they believe it will do no harm. I have yet to hear one Republican upon the floor of the Senate say that he believes it a good thing. I have yet to hear one Republican member of the Finance Committee, that reported it without recommendation, say that it is a good thing. Are you going to vote for it because it is for the general benefit of the country, thus putting behind some of your treasured political notions as to the tariff, sacrificing the politics of the present for the good of the future? I have yet to hear one Republican say so.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Did I understand the Senator from Wyoming to say that there were Republicans who were going to vote for it because they believed it was a good thing?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no.

Mr. CLAPP. How?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I did not say so. I assumed there are some.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like his photograph.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I said I assumed there were some. And I asked, if they did vote for it, was it because they believed that it was a good thing for the general good of the country irrespective of our teachings upon the tariff?

Then, I ask any protective Republican in this Chamber, are you going to vote for it because you believe it is in consonance or sympathy or accord with the position of your party for 50 years upon the question of protection? No one of the regular Republicans will rise in his place and answer yes. Then, for God's sake, why are you going to vote for it? I have heard one reason, and one only. The reason is that it will not do any great harm. The only reason why a Republican who claims to have the fire on the altars of his patriotism and his party always burning can find for voting for this Democratic measure is that it will not do any particular harm.

I will tell you what harm it will do, my friends. You are turning the grindstone to sharpen the knife that will put the hide of protection on the fence all over this country. That is exactly the harm you are doing. You are opening the tent, and the camel's head will be in, and it will not be very long before the camel will be in and you will be out, my Republican friends.

I do not wonder that our Democratic friends are enthusiastically and almost unanimously in favor of this pact. What they have not been able to do for 50 years we Republicans are going to do for them here in 30 days. We are doing their work for them. We are wiping protection from the statute books. We are using the club that shall kill our protected interests. We are doing it ourselves, and it is no wonder they feel pleasant and are agreeable to joining in the operation.

But the political situation is extremely strange. Here we have a pact or an agreement, a trade agreement made between the United States and Canada, or between the representatives of those Governments. The trade agreement is sent to the House with the pretty distinct notion that the instructions that accompany it are that the agreement shall be passed without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." It is called a reciprocal agreement.

Mr. NELSON. If that is true, section 2 ought to be eliminated from the bill entirely.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was just going to say that if those instructions had been followed or if that view had been followed, the bill would not be in its present form here. But instead of dotting the "i" over in the House, they blackened the eye by inserting this section 2. They amended the agreement; and now we are told by Republicans upon this floor, by regular Republicans upon this floor, that we must pass this bill without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

The bill as it came from the conference between the two countries—the bill agreed to by Secretary Knox and Minister Fielding? not at all, but the bill prepared and passed by an overwhelming majority of the Democratic House and against the majority of the Republicans voting thereon—we are told we must pass, not the Canadian agreement, but the House bill without an amendment. And why without amendment? Under what code of ethics? Under what code of political responsibility are we as Senators of the United States acting? We might as well abolish ourselves. We might as well go home. We do not even need to send a postal card to represent us if we are not to act upon our individual and party judgment.

Mr. President, I had no idea of taking any of the time of the Senate. I apologize to the Senate. But I wanted my position plainly understood, and I want the regular Republicans in this Senate to understand exactly the bridge which they have constructed to pass over from Republican protective tariff to the Democratic tariff plan. I want them to understand that they are laying open the whole system of a protective tariff.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. WORKS. In view of what the Senator has said, I should like to ask him whether he believes that the action of any Member of this body should be governed or controlled by the action of the caucus of his party or any part of it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I surely believe in party action and the rule of majorities.

Mr. WORKS. You believe in the caucus, and that a Member of this body should be bound——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not believe in a caucus of the Senate, because we have never had a caucus of the Senate. The caucus is unknown in the Senate procedure. That is, on the Republican side. I am not speaking of the Democratic side.

Mr. WORKS. Then you believe we should resort to the caucus in order to bind Members to vote for a measure that is viewed with favor by a majority.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator puts a conclusion in my mouth which I have studiously denied. There has never been such a thing as a caucus upon the Republican side of this Chamber, within my recollection, in 16 years. There are those here who have been here longer. The so-called Republican caucus is a Republican conference, and the purpose of that conference is to talk over, to confer about, to consider matters that may be of party importance; and in a majority of cases—in nearly every case within my recollection—the majority of the conference has determined the action of the party, although the most eminent Senators who were ever on this side of the Chamber—notably the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, and the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt—reiterated the doctrine I reiterate now, that while in union there is strength, and while it is desirable to get, if possible, the unanimous agreement of the party, yet no man's individual conscience can be bound by the action of any number of men.

Mr. WORKS. I am glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But——

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator, if he will allow me——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. Whether he believes that the action of any Member of this body should be governed or controlled by the wishes or desires of another department of the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to know before I answer that question whether the Senator is going to ask me any more or not.

Mr. CLAPP. I am willing to take the burden off the shoulders of the Senator from Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from California, I will state that my idea is this: I can see no reason on earth why the various departments of the Government may not act with the utmost harmony upon public questions if they are of the same political party; but I believe upon any measure that shall be pending before Congress, it is the plain duty of either House to act irrespective of what may be urged, except in the way of legitimate argument, by any other department of the Government.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator from Wyoming regard this as a political measure?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do. It is a Democratic measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was interested in what the Senator from Wyoming said in regard to party caucuses, or conferences, in the Senate. The Senator said that during his 16 years of service he had not understood that any meeting of Republican Senators could properly be called a caucus, but, rather, a conference. That is true. I have had longer service than the Senator here, and that has been the view that always has been taken. Yet it has ordinarily been understood that, unless there were some overwhelming reasons to the contrary, the will of the majority of Republicans in conference would be accepted as the will of the party.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is not any question about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from California——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, this is a matter we are very much interested in on this side. We would like to have the Senator speak louder.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has not yielded, except to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. STONE. It is a matter of order I ask.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must first receive the consent of the Chair to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I have asked consent. I have addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has yielded to the Senator from New Hampshire. Until that Senator indicates his willingness to yield no other Senator will be recognized.

Mr. STONE. The Chair is right. I make no complaint. I simply wanted the Senator to talk loud enough to be heard.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia will state his question of order.

Mr. BACON. I am not willing to concede what the Senator from Missouri says. When a Senator is unable to hear it is not a question of the consent of the occupant of the floor, but a question going to a point of order, which is a matter to be addressed to the Chair. When a Senator says he can not hear it is a point of order, and it does not depend upon the consent of the Senator who is holding the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Missouri to address the Chair when he rose, but he addressed his remarks to either the Senator from Wyoming or the Senator from New Hampshire. The Chair indicated that he must first receive the consent of the Chair before interrupting the Senator.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly the point of order I made, that when that is the purpose a Senator does not have to get consent of the Senator on the floor, but it is a matter for the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has disposed of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had supposed that my fault ordinarily has been that I talk too loud rather than too low. I will endeavor so to speak that the Senator from Missouri will understand what I say, whether it is important or unimportant.

I was about to suggest, Mr. President, that the Senator from California raises the point that Republicans are not bound by the will of the majority, and we concede that regarding important questions as to our conferences in the Senate. That is true also in a broader sense, if Republicans feel at liberty to disregard the will of the majority. However, the Senator from California will recall the fact that, while I believe he was a minority candidate in the State of California, when it came to electing a Senator the Senator and his friends insisted that the legislature should vote for him and not some other man.

Mr. WORKS. On the contrary——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must first address the Chair and obtain recognition.

Mr. WORKS. I did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please wait for recognition. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator if I am permitted to do so.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken. I was not a minority candidate in California. On the contrary, I carried the Republican vote of the State by a plurality, and also the Democratic vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, some of the papers of California have not stated the matter accurately if that be true. Certainly the Senator was not a majority candidate in the legislative districts of his State, and he insisted upon the legislature electing him because he received more votes than any other candidate. I have no disposition to argue the matter beyond the mere suggestion, if the Senator from Wyoming will permit me a moment further, that if we are to have a Republican Party in this country we can only have it by permitting the majority to control. Going from the State of California to the State of Oregon, we know that the Senator who was elected was a minority candidate, and yet he insisted that because he received more votes in the primaries than any other one candidate he was entitled to the support of the legislature, and he received it. In other words, a plurality candidate invoked the support of the legislature because he was a plurality candidate.

Mr. President, I think it would be better that we should come to a fairly clear understanding about this matter and conclude that if we are to exist as a party we can only do so by recognizing the will of the majority of the party as being something that at least is worthy of our consideration, and not assert, as has been asserted over and over again recently in this body, that we can do as we please; that we can recognize the majority will or not; that we can vote with one party or with another party as best suits our convenience and our purpose, and yet we are Republicans. I repudiate, Mr. President, any such position upon the part of any member of the Republican Party, if we are to have a Republican Party.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. I have been deeply interested in the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming, and I have agreed with almost everything he has said.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia will state his point of order.

Mr. BACON. We can not hear the Senator from Montana on this side.

Mr. DIXON. I will try and speak loud enough so that the Senator from Georgia may hear what I have to say, for I think it may be of interest to him.

The Senator from Wyoming has just said that this Canadian reciprocity treaty, so called, was not a Republican measure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I said it was a Democratic measure.

Mr. DIXON. That is the way I understood it. The Senator from Wyoming also says that the majority of the Republicans in the House of Representatives voted against this so-called Canadian reciprocity bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I so read the RECORD.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether it is not a matter of fact that a majority of the Republican Senators on this side of the Chamber are lined against the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that is the truth.

Mr. DIXON. Then, in speaking of regular Republican Senators, would the Senator classify this minority of the Republican Senators who are in favor of the bill as regular Republicans when a majority of the Republican Senators are voting in opposition to it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. All Republican Senators look alike to me, but they look better when they are voting Republican principles.

Mr. DIXON. I wholly agree with the Senator in that; but, applying this rule to this Democratic measure that this minority of Republicans are supporting, they certainly can not arrogate to themselves the title of regular Republicans.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think they are. I think they are trying to avoid all mention of regular Republicanism in connection with the bill.

Mr. DIXON. How would the Senator classify the Republican Finance Committee, a majority of whom, I understand, is for the bill? Are they regulars or insurgents?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Being a member of the committee, my modesty makes me decline to classify them. Of course the Senator very well knows, because it has been stated on this floor over and over again, that a majority of the Republicans on the Finance Committee are against this bill.

Mr. DIXON. How would the Senator classify the chairman of the Finance Committee who reported the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He is beyond classification in all things.

Mr. DIXON. Is he a regular or an insurgent?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He stands by himself.

Mr. DIXON. He is in a class by himself. I just wanted to add that the shoe seems to pinch the other side of the foot.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, having gone through the political catechism as to my individual views, I wish to sum up in substance, before the debate is over upon this bill, the reasons why I am opposed to the bill.

I am opposed to it because I believe from all the evidence I can gather that it works a distinct and a dreadful injury to a large class of the producers in the United States. I believe this from the evidence presented by the farmers of the Northwest, who came here in their own behalf, unbiased and unmoved by any appeal from the firm in New York, unbiased and unmoved by any appeal from the National Grange, because they do not belong to the National Grange, I understand; unbiased and unmoved by anything except a deep and strong conviction, made by years of study of their own condition, made by their knowledge as readers of the public prints of the conditions across the line, their knowledge of the possibilities of the unknown Canadian northwest, and their absolute knowledge of the limitations of their own country and with an intelligence that I do not believe has been equaled before any committee of the Senate in many years. They presented their reasons for being against this pact—that it would injuriously affect them in stock and store and happiness. I am against it because I believe that class of our citizens should and must receive consideration if the protective tariff system is to survive the assaults which will be made upon it in the next four years. I am against this pact because even its most strenuous adherents do not urge one single valid reason in its behalf.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With pleasure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether he agrees with the admission made by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] last Thursday that heretofore the duties imposed under a protective tariff on farming products had not benefited the farming class?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As I understood the Senator from New York, he made no such statement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to read what the Senator from New York said?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator permit me to state my understanding?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me read from the RECORD. I have it here.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator permit me in my own time to state my understanding of what the Senator from New York said or, at least, as it made an impression upon my mind; not in these words, of course. He doubted very much whether the farmers had received very much benefit from the protective tariff, but probably—and I have stated this before—when the point of consumption and the point of production were brought nearer together the farmer might receive a protection. I think that is substantially what the Senator from New York said.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The sentence——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, yes; I will yield to the reading of the RECORD, although sometimes I do not like it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The distinguished Senator from New York used this language:

> I never have thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer.

That is the admission one of the great leaders of the Republican Party made on this floor last week.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My memory is a little hazy about that. Will the Senator read a little further?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a complete sentence by itself.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator read a little further?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no objection to reading the whole paragraph if the Senator desires.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I just wanted to see whether my recollection is correct or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am quoting here the admission made by the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I got an impression somewhere that the Senator had running through his mind the possibility of the point of production and the point of consumption meeting; and if he did not say it, I do not know where I got it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not disputing that statement, but I am asking whether the Senator from Wyoming agrees with the Senator from New York that in the past the farmer has been hoodwinked by the claim that he was receiving or has received any benefit from the protective tariff. That is a statement of fact and belief of the Senator from New York that in the past the farmer has received no benefit from this tariff upon the products of his farm.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator still has not read the part to which I referred.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have read sufficient to incorporate into the RECORD the admission by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator has read sufficient to incorporate into the RECORD a sentence and then declines to incorporate into the RECORD a following sentence that might, perhaps, explain it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will leave it to the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from New York to incorporate a qualifying sentence.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The statement of the Senator from New York was substantially as I said, and I am surprised that the Senator from Nebraska should seek here to record a part of that thought and then decline to read into it the balance although he has it before him.

I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming. I will preface my question by making a statement.

I do not think that I ever heard a clearer or a more convincing presentation of the question of protection than that presented by the Senator from New York in his speech the other day. He almost persuaded me that there was a real genuine, patriotic, economic ground for the doctrine of protection as enunciated by him. His idea was, as I caught it, that protection was for the purpose of encouraging American enterprise and industry to such a point that it could equal in quality and in quantity such American production as would be to the benefit of all the American people as it grew and progressed and met their needs.

The Senator from Wyoming, as I understand him, is claiming that the converse of that is your protection doctrine; that as our production decreases and the American people are to suffer by lack of foodstuffs, protection must afford its benefits; that not in increasing and meeting the needs of the American people but in decreasing it shall enrich them at the expense of the American people.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator can not get me into any argument about the merits or demerits of protection or the various kinds of protection. If the Senator had been listening to my speech he would know it has been a speech made to the Republicans of the Senate, all of whom believe in the protective tariff policy, and it has not been directed to the Democrats.

I have congratulated the Democratic Party in this Chamber because of the opportunity of which they so skillfully availed themselves in the presentation of this bill. I congratulate the Democratic Party that that old dame is still able to flirt with the whole neighborhood, to make eyes at the insurgents on sugar and the wool schedule, to make eyes at some of the regulars on this reciprocity and get away with the whole business, as I am told you are going to do. But still I am not here to argue the protective tariff, but only to try and convince some of my Republican friends, at whose feet I have studied for years the theory of a protective tariff, that now, in the extremity of that doctrine, when every cannon of the adversaries is turned against the battlements, they should not desert and go with you. That is what I have been trying to get at.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Just for a question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the production of wheat in the Northwest—I will take that as an illustration—was so great that the surplus had to be disposed of and consumption and production had not reached almost the place where there was a sufficient amount for the American people, would the Senator believe that the passage or nonpassage of this reciprocity bill, in so far as it affects wheat, would have no effect upon the farmer? Suppose we were to make twice as much as the American people needed and the western farmer was making twice as much as the market would justify, or as would protect him in the market, does the Senator think it would be any benefit whatever to the farmer in the price he is to receive?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, it is of little concern what I think or may not think. I am not discussing the policy of protection. I am not discussing the question whether or not that policy protects the farmer. I am discussing nothing except the action of the Republican Party in regard to this fundamental policy and this fundamental political belief.

I am not going to be drawn into any argument on the protective tariff, because if I should talk, and the Senator from South Carolina should talk across this aisle from now until Congress adjourns, his idea would still be the same. My idea is, and has been for 50 years, that the Republican doctrine of protection is the saving grace of our industrial system. The Senator's thought probably is, as often expressed in the Democratic platform, that that policy is a delusion and a snare, if not worse. So we would not get together, and we would not get any nearer together. I am not addressing any argument to Democrats in favor of protection, and I am talking to no one on this occasion who favor the opposite doctrine, but I am trying to convince some of my Republican friends that they are here and now throwing overboard this doctrine, which has been the sheet anchor of our party, and the doctrine which we have always believed is the sheet anchor of prosperity in this country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It was not a question as to that, Mr. President, with all deference to the Senator, and with an acknowledgment of the courtesy he has shown me in allowing me to put this question to him; but I understood him to say that now, just as we had reached a point in our production where the farmer was likely to get a benefit from this protection, we were doing him an incalculable harm, throwing the door wide open, and denying him that which he was just now coming into.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is partly right and partly wrong. I was stating the fact——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I dread the eloquence of the Senator from New Jersey, and I fear his questions, those questions fearfully and wonderfully made.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask if I understand the Senator correctly, that this is not a question of reciprocity, but that it is a question of politics, Democratic or Republican? I have heard the distinguished Senator make remarks regarding the political phase of the question, and then interjected in his remarks were remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] asking if the Republican Party had ceased to exist. I want to answer that by a quotation from one of the distinguished and great Republican papers of the great city of New York——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will not yield for that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming declines to yield further.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I beg the Senator will not introduce into the reciprocity discussion anything that any newspaper in the great city of New York has stated.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It has no particular reference to the——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming declines to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator can introduce it in his own time. I do not care to have my remarks defaced by the interjection of matter of that kind.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to enlighten the Senator as to what the Republican Party——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming declines to yield for that purpose.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I suppose, if it is perfectly in order, that I may enlighten a distinguished member of the Republican Party as to whether or not the Republican Party exists or is in control of this Senate; and with that view I most respectfully ask the privilege of quoting from the great Mail and Express of the city of New York——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield for that purpose?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from New Jersey always enlightens us when he speaks, but I object, Mr. President, to newspaper controversies or views being printed in my remarks, or as a part of them. The Senator, of course, will find no objection if he presents them in his own time as a part of his views.

I am not, Mr. President, in this discussion arguing for one moment that I agree with all the members of my party. I am conscious of the fact, Mr. President—sadly conscious of the fact—that my action on this bill is at total variance with many great leaders of the Republican Party, but I believe as firmly as I believe anything else which is strong-rooted down deep in my heart that these leaders of the Republican Party are wrong on this proposition, and I have taken this opportunity, which I seldom do, to differ with my Republican associates, because I feel deeply the effect the proposed action may have on the future of our party, and if on the future of our party, then upon the future of our Nation.

I said, Mr. President, when I was interrupted, that I was against this measure because I believed it was not for the best interests of the country. I said I was against it because no man has risen in his place and shown where any great section of our country would be benefited by it. What great Republican leader is there, what protectionist is there to be found who either here or elsewhere has said that the country will be greatly benefited by this legislation?

It is assumed in many great centers that Canadian reciprocity is the solution for the high cost of living—a hope as baseless as the idle wind—and the very man who is most interested in seeing this pact carried through does not seek to hold out to the consumer the hope that he will be benefited by the reduction of high prices by virtue of this legislation. The best that anyone has said is that it will not do any great harm.

I am opposed to this bill because, in my judgment, it violates every principle of protection to which we have given adherence. It violates our last national utterance on protection in the Chicago platform. There is nothing in it from A to Z in accordance with Republican doctrine; but there is in it, my Republican friends, that which you and I in the Republican Party have steadfastly set our face against since our party had its birth, and that is the Democratic doctrine of free trade. That is in this bill and of it and through it; it is the foundation stone of the bill, as protection is the foundation stone of our party policy.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming just one question with reference to one of the last remarks he made, because I am sure he wants to keep the RECORD straight.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If I understood the Senator correctly, he said that there has not been a single great party leader on the Republican side who advocated the doctrine embodied in the proposed reciprocity agreement.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no; I did not say that. There are lots of them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then I misunderstood the Senator; but that is the manner in which I understood him; and in view of that understanding I desired to ask him in what category he did put the real author of this proposal?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. To whom does the Senator refer?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I refer to the President, of course. As I understand, this is largely the great issue upon which, in fact, he called the extra session; and I am quite sure that the Senator from Wyoming is not standing here in this day of protection and attempting to read the Chief Executive, the head and front of his party, out of his party. He called this extra session for the purpose of passing this very measure, and now the Senator denominates it a Democratic measure and claims that no real good, regular, stalwart Republican can support it without threatening the very foundation of Republicanism, when the man who carried your standard to victory and who to-day is the head and front of the Republican Party is sponsor for this measure; and this extraordinary session was called to pass it as a good Republican measure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator asks a question, in which he assumes that I said something that I never did say, and then he assumes a division between the President and the Republican Party that does not exist.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. With the permission of the Senator, I should very much like to hear the explanation of his strictures on reciprocity.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator had paid attention, he would remember that I said I opposed it because among all its advocates no one seemed to rise and give a good reason for its passage or attempt to show that any large portion of our citizens are favorably affected by it. That is what I said.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Does the Senator not consider the President's message that accompanied the proposed agreement as a good reason, from a Republican standpoint, for the passage of this measure?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not consider the President's message to Congress as the reason why I should vote for the measure.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is not the question, Mr. President. The question I asked was, did the Senator consider it a good reason?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the answer, Mr. President, whether it is to the question or not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then the Senator puts the President, in so far as he is related to reciprocity, in the category of a good Democrat?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the Senator will find, when the time comes, that the President will be amply able to take care of himself. I said this was a Democratic measure. If it is not, what is it and where did it have its origin? It had its origin in the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, which is Democratic. Where did it have its vote? On the Democratic side of the House of Representatives. Where has it its vote in this Chamber? Upon the Democratic side of the Senate.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With great pleasure.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it not a fact that the bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by the leader of the Republican minority; that the bill itself was prepared by him; and, that being so, can the Senator doubt that it entered the House under very excellent Republican auspices?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand, whether my understanding is correct or not—and I may be pardoned for mentioning names in order to make my answer clear—that the bill was prepared by Representative McCALL, of Massachusetts, one of those protection Republicans that I grieve from my heart to see taking his present position and laying, as I have said, the ax at the very root of the tree of protection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like, with the permission of the Senator from Wyoming, to ask him a question, but before asking the question I want to make a statement. The Senator said that this bill is a free-trade bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No. The Senator must be accurate. I have spoken absolutely without notes, but when I get through I have a tolerably clear idea of what I have said. What I did say on that point is that I opposed it because there was in it the Democratic doctrine of free trade.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says that it is a Democratic bill. Does the Senator mean he thinks it is Democratic because of the free trade in it? Is that what the Senator means to say?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Substantially, I believe it is a Democratic bill, because it carries out the Democratic doctrine with regard to the tariff, and is opposed, in my opinion, to the Republican doctrine with regard to the tariff.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that this bill is chock full of free trade. It puts all the products of the farm and forest upon the free list, and to that extent it is a free-trade measure. I concede that. But the Democratic Party is not a free-trade party; it is not in favor of free trade.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am glad to hear the Senator say that, because three eminent Democrats have risen within the last three days and said they were free traders.

Mr. SIMMONS. Can the Senator point me out a single item in this bill which applies the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment. This bill is chock full of free trade—and that is one of the reasons I am against it, because I am not a free trader. It is full of free trade and protection, but there is not a line in it that gives application to the Democratic doctrine of tariff for revenue, and therefore I insist that it is not a Democratic measure. It is a free-trade and protection measure, but not a tariff-for-revenue measure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator and myself, in fact, are upon a common ground. He is not a free trader, and I am not a free trader. He is for a tariff for revenue, and I agree that this is a bad bill. We have free trade at the start; we have free trade at the end. We have a little tariff scattered along through the middle, but in his portion of the country and in mine we both look out for the man who "plays both ends against the middle."

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I desire the Senator to give me information upon. I have been carefully studying this bill; I have been trying to analyze it with a view to finding out whether there is in it anywhere a single item that applies the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No. Assuming for the sake of the answer that the Democratic doctrine is a tariff for revenue, the Senator and I both know that this bill will not produce revenue, but that, on the other hand, it will throw it overboard in bucketfuls.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say to the Senator that while there are reductions in the duties levied upon manufactured products in this bill, there is not a single reduction, so far as I have been able to find, that will bring the duty that is retained upon any manufactured product in this bill down to the revenue basis. On the contrary, I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that there is not a great deal of protection in this bill—not as much as he wants, of course, and not as much as the Republican Party wants, of course—but there is not a single manufactured product, of which a farm product is the raw material, upon which the duty in this bill in practical effect is not actually increased; and in some instances the increase amounts to as much as a hundred per cent.

I have here before me a table prepared by an expert of the Treasury Department, who has been assigned to the minority members of the Finance Committee by the Treasury Department, and who, I think, is one of the actuaries in that department, the same expert, as I understand, that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the other House used. According to the table furnished me by this expert, while there is a nominal reduction of the duty on cattle on the hoof, the duty retained on meat, the manufactured product, in view of the fact that the duty is taken off of the raw product, affords a greater amount of protection to the packer than exists under the present law.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, very much greater.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very much greater. I want to give the Senator the figures for the purpose of showing him that he is mistaken if he thinks that this bill is not full of protection as well as free trade. The truth is, Mr. President, the bill is nothing but free trade at one end and protection at the other; that is all there is of it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Which end has the protection in it—the first or the last?

Mr. SIMMONS. The free trade comes first and the protection afterwards—free trade upon the raw products; free trade upon the products of the forest and the farm; protection upon the products of the mills and the factories. That is the kind of bill it is.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. About as bad as they could make it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, upon swine, according to the figures furnished me——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just let me finish this.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit the Chair to make an inquiry? The present occupant of the chair has been absent from the Chamber for a moment and he does not know who is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Wyoming still have the floor?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Wyoming is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I had taken my seat, but the Senator from North Carolina rose to make an inquiry, to which I am listening.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina, then, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. The inquiry I rose to make was whether the Senator from Wyoming was able to point me out a single item in this whole bill that applies the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue. He has said he is unable to do that. Yet he insists upon saying it is a Democratic measure, because it has a lot of free trade in it. I have never understood the Democratic Party to be a free-trade party. I myself surely am not a free trader.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the Senator from North Carolina, in relation to the party on the other side of the aisle, has substantially the same difficulty I have on this side. I am unable to convince some of my colleagues as to the Republican doctrine. He is unable to convince a majority of his colleagues as to the Democratic doctrine, because we have had three distinct expressions from that side against the proposition the Senator has announced.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not found anybody on this side in favor of free trade.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In relation to this present bill and the inquiry of the Senator, I do not want the Senator to understand that because I have completed what I started to say I have in any wise exhausted the iniquities of this bill, and I am delighted to have the Senator go on and speak of those matters in the bill which are matters of common knowledge as being unfair in the application of the doctrine of protection, to be added to what I have already said.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was afraid from the Senator's remarks that the protection in this bill had escaped his attention, and I wanted to call his attention to it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; not all. I was ashamed to speak of it; that is all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. Does he denominate this as a bad bill because it gives free trade in lumber?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not desire to use the word "bad." If I have used that word, I withdraw it. It is a bill I can not support in this form. I do not regard it as a good bill.

I will content myself by putting into the RECORD the table to which I have referred as showing a large net increase in the protection which the pending bill affords over the present law upon meat products and upon flour. In the aggregate it amounts sometimes to over 100 per cent. I do not desire to elaborate that. I simply referred to it for the purpose of showing that there is a great deal of protection in this measure as well as free trade.

The table referred to is as follows:

Effect of proposed reciprocity upon the protection to certain industries.

	Duty.
	Present.	Reciprocity.
Beef cattle:
Alive, valued at $50	$13.75

Mr. REED, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. HITCHCOCK addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield, and to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri, if I have the floor. I do not know whether I have the floor or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri is yielded to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say, before yielding, that of course I regret to have to disagree with my colleagues on this side of the Chamber about this measure.

It has been understood all the time that I did disagree with them, and I am expressing here to-day the views I expressed just before the close of the last session of Congress, when I made an elaborate speech upon this subject—my individual views. Then and now I spoke for myself alone.

Mr. REED and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to ask a question of the Senator from North Carolina before he takes his seat?

Mr. REED. I surely will.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri in turn yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina about this table he has had inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. I only want to insert——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator by whom it was prepared and at whose request.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was prepared at my request.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was prepared at your request? That is what I want.

Mr. SIMMONS. By a Treasury expert who has been assigned by the action of the Finance Committee to assist the minority members of that committee in getting up statistics.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was prepared by him at your request?

Mr. SIMMONS. At my request, just as he will prepare and, I have no doubt, has prepared some for you——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I am sure he is preparing every day like tables for other minority members of the Finance Committee.

I want to say, further, at the suggestion of the Senator from Texas that his instruction is that when he prepares a table for one minority member of the Finance Committee he is to furnish every other minority member of the committee with a copy of the same table.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I had yielded to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is for just a moment.

Mr. REED. I yield, if I may, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Surely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming is yielded to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wanted to read into the RECORD the balance of the paragraph to which the Senator from Nebraska called my attention. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], in answer to an inquiry of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], said, as reported in the RECORD of June 21, at page 2374:

> I must be permitted to answer the question of the Senator, because a question put by him is always entitled to respectful consideration. I think that here and there, at certain localities along the border, farmers have been benefited by protection on their food products. I do not think that as a class in general up to this time or until perhaps within a very short period, the protection upon food products has been of any real advantage to the farmer. I do not think that the Senator from New Jersey is justified in inferring from that that the farmers have been hoodwinked. I think that the farmers have, upon their own good judgment, believed that it was beneficial to them to have this duty, probably more because they were looking forward to the time when it would be useful for them than that they thought it had already been useful for them as a class.

That is what the Senator from New York said.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask from what page the Senator is reading?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. From page 2374.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At the top of the first column?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What is that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am unable to find it. The Senator from Wyoming did not read the last of the paragraph of which I read a part.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was reading the complement of what the Senator read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator, however, has read from a different colloquy altogether. What I read was a colloquy between the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I have no objections to reading the balance of that paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The reason I wanted this read was that the position taken by the Senator from New York might fully appear, and I will read the balance of the first colloquy:

> Mr. President, I have stated my view regarding the inevitable result of the process which is now going on upon the system of food duties. I never have thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer. They have been quite indifferent, affecting only several localities here and there, so long as our production ran far ahead of our consumption. But, with the increase of our cities as compared with our farming population and the using up of our waste lands and the fencing in of old cattle ranges and the reduction of the productive power of our land, we have about come to the point where the continuance of those duties, instead of being a matter of indifference to the people of the country, would result in putting up the cost of food.

I am not arguing the question. I am simply stating a reason why the farmers should not consider that this reciprocity arrangement is doing them any particular harm, because it is something that is sure to come to them anyway.

When I was quoting the Senator from New York it was not because I agreed with his views, but simply to state the position which he assumed, and I desired, in my answer to the Senator's interrogatory some time ago, to have the position of the Senator from New York appear as announced, both in his answer I have read and his answer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before we get too far from the question which I originally addressed to the Senator from Wyoming I should like to revert to it in order to ask him what he will do now that he is upon the other horn of the dilemma. My first question was whether he agreed with the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] when he used this language:

I never have thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer.

Now, instead of replying to that question the Senator from Wyoming has insisted on having read the balance of the same paragraph of the speech of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he agrees with the further statement of the Senator from New York when he states that to continue those present duties would result in putting up the cost of food?

That is the language the Senator from Wyoming has insisted in reading, quoting from the Senator from New York, and now that he is upon that other horn of the dilemma I should like to inquire whether he agrees with the Senator from New York in that proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course I do not. I do not believe——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that the Senator from Wyoming——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not believe that the price of food in this country depends for one moment to-day upon the price that the farmer receives for his product. I do not believe that reducing the price of wheat 10 cents a bushel would reduce the price of flour a cent a barrel.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that the Senator from Wyoming disagrees with the Senator from New York when he declares that the tariffs maintained in the past on farm products have not benefited the farmer, and he also disagrees with him when he declares that to maintain those tariffs would result in increasing the cost of food to the people.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator absolutely states incorrectly my position upon both propositions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming what he has gained by reading the balance of the paragraph of the Senator from New York when he disagrees with the qualification as much as with the original statement?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I did not have the statement of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] read because I believed or disbelieved what he said. I had that section of it read because I wanted his position made clear.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I will continue to yield.

Mr. ROOT. I merely wish to make my acknowledgment to the Senator from Wyoming for preventing the RECORD of to-day standing with the garbled and unfair version of what I said the other day.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I started to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question, and was interrupted and did not conclude that question. I do not desire now, since the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has yielded the floor, to ask the question. But the spectacle of a stand-pat Republican and of a Democrat standing together on the same platform and illustrating the idea of how beautiful a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity is so remarkable an exhibition that I shall take great pleasure in offering some observations upon it before this debate closes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize that it may seem somewhat ungracious at this hour, when Senators appear to be ready to vote upon the Root amendment, to make any remarks upon it. I am especially embarrassed also by the fact that I have given notice that I would address the Senate to-morrow on the merits of the reciprocal agreement itself as they appear to me. But that notice was given before I knew we were to vote on the amendment before Tuesday.

I am convinced, Mr. President, after looking over all of the facts and circumstances connected with the case, that the Root amendment, so called, does make the House bill as it is presented here conform practically to the agreement as made. I realize that it will make very little difference to those Senators who are opposed to the agreement itself or who are willing that any amendment should be made to it whether this bill conforms to the original agreement or not. But it is of considerable importance to me to know what that agreement was and what the Root amendment seeks to do.

Until recently I had not supposed that there was any doubt in the mind of any Senator as to just exactly what the Canadian representatives and the United States representatives intended by that original agreement, and it was to the effect that wood pulp and paper and board not exceeding in value 4 cents a pound were to pass freely without duty between the two countries when, and only when, no restrictions whatever were imposed upon exports of these products from Canada.

I submit, Mr. President, that no one can read the correspondence that passed between the Canadian representative and Secretary Knox on January 21 last, unembarrassed by any suggestions that have been made since, and not come to the conclusion that the agreement was such as I have stated.

This is also confirmed by the statements of Mr. Fielding, one of the contracting parties, before the Canadian Parliament on the 23d day of January last. There has been some dispute as to just exactly what he said, and in order that this matter may be made clear I have obtained a report of his speech contained in the Canadian House of Commons Debates; and I am going to insert that, or the portions of it which apply to this, in the RECORD.

I am going to read a portion of it, so as to make it clear what was the understanding of Mr. Fielding.

He said in the course of his speech:

Before I proceed to take up the schedules in detail, there are one or two interesting features which I am sure the house would wish me to explain at the earliest moment.

He is discussing the Canadian pact.

We have had very interesting discussions from time to time over the question of the duty on paper and pulp of various kinds. Our American friends were anxious for some tariff change in relation to these articles. We ourselves were anxious for some tariff changes. As respects certain grades of pulp and paper, mechanically ground pulp, chemical pulp, common printing paper known as news print, and the common pasteboard and the cheaper articles of paper other than news print, or common paper, up to a limited value of 4 cents per pound, we believed that we could compete with our American friends on these particular articles and that it was desirable we should have free trade in them. As to the paper of a more advanced quality, I doubt if we would be able to compete with them, and we did not take that class of paper into our negotiations. But as respects pulp of its various kinds and common news-print paper and common pasteboard and common paper of all kinds running to the value of 4 cents per pound, we would have been quite willing to have reciprocity with them. They said, "We are"—

That is, referring to our representatives—

They said: "We are quite willing to do that if you provide that the regulations which exist in some of your Provinces with regard to the shipment of pulp wood shall be removed." Of course, there could be but one answer to that. We have nothing to do with the provincial regulations. These regulations have been made by the provincial governments in accordance with what they believed to be the best interests of their respective Provinces, and whether they are good or bad regulations was not for us to debate with our friends of the United States. And so we had to say to them: "If you propose to put any such limitations upon the arrangement, we can not object to your doing for yourselves what you think best respecting the terms and conditions upon which you will admit our paper into your country; you have the right to impose these conditions, and if they do not suit Canada no harm is done; but we on our side will not agree to make paper and pulp and these articles free in Canada until you have made them free in your country from every Province and part of the Dominion of Canada." So the matter stands in this way: That they will put in their tariff, as set forth in their correspondence with us, an item that these various grades of pulp and paper shall be made free if there be no regulations, either in the form of an export duty or in the form of the provincial regulations interfering with the shipments of pulp wood. Whenever that condition arises they will make paper free. We said: "All right, but that is no good for us, and we will not make your paper free in Canada until you remove the restriction."

The President of the United States was instrumental in making this arrangement, and he has admitted, in public, and does not deny it now, that this agreement was to take effect when Canada removed all restrictions. I think no one will read section 10 in the letter of Fielding and Paterson without understanding that they believed that all provisions as to the free entry of paper, wood, and pulp of the character named should be inoperative until the Canadian restrictions should be removed. They were speaking of Canada as a whole. If this provision is to be of any use at all, it must be construed by the courts eventually. This paper provision is a part of this agreement, and it should be so harmonious that it will conduce to better relations between the two nations. If this provision can be construed to mean what the opponents of the pending amendment claim for it, then it will cause confusion rather than harmony. With the House bill unamended, I still think the court must construe it to mean what the contracting parties intended it to mean, but the expressions of gentlemen in both Houses of Congress would complicate that construction if the court takes notice of such expressions.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. The court, in construing the provision of section 2 of this law, would construe it with reference to its language alone, would it not; that is, entirely independent and aside from the correspondence between the two Governments?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think it is very liable to do that. I think it ought to do it.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator thinks it would do that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am inclined to think it would.

Mr. BROWN. Then, in the opinion of the court, there could be no doubt about what this provision meant, unless the doubt arises from the provision itself?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; unless it takes cognizance of what some Congressmen say.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator does not contend that there is any doubt about what section 2 means as it passed the House and as it is reported to the Senate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator from Nebraska understand the provision to mean that pulp or paper or wood from any part of Canada can come into the United States free if any other part of Canada imposes restrictions on exports?

Mr. BROWN. It does not mean anything of the kind. The provision means just what it says, that paper, pulp, and spruce—I use spruce as a substitute for pulp wood—shall come into this country free of duty when that print paper, pulp, and spruce is free from any restriction imposed by a Province of Canada.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That particular shipment?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. In other words, the provision attaches to the wood, it attaches to the print paper, it attaches to the pulp, and it has nothing at all to do with that pulp and print paper and spruce which is restricted in any way by any Province of Canada.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The very statement of the Senator from Nebraska indicates what doubts may arise, because he clearly differs from every one of the men who had anything to do with making this agreement. No one of them believed that a pound of paper or wood pulp could come into this country when there was any restriction by any Province of Canada.

Mr. BROWN. Let me show the trouble under which the Senator is laboring. He confuses the agreement as he understands it with section 2 in the law. There is nobody disagreeing to-day about what section 2 means. It means just what I said it means. But there is a difference of opinion about what the agreement originally was. The agreement is wholly immaterial, so far as Congress is concerned. We are not called upon to vote up or down the agreement. We are called upon to vote section 2 into the law or out of the law. The agreement is not offered here. If there is any difference, it is between the agreement and the provision of the statute. If the Senator will confine his argument to section 2, he will find that there will be no doubt in his mind as to what it means.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. While the Senator from Nebraska is correct in saying that the court will construe the law, is there not a possibility that the court, in construing the law, will take the same view of the law which the men who framed the law took? If the men who framed the law believed they were providing that no paper could come into this country as long as any paper would be burdened by a restriction, is it not quite likely the court would take the same view?

Mr. BROWN. The court could not take the same view, because the court could not take into consideration matters relating to the negotiation of the agreement. The agreement was made by one set of people and the law is passed by another set.

Mr. CLAPP. I am not saying that the court would not take into account the views of the men who framed the law, but if the men who framed this bill sought to convey an idea, and believed they were conveying that idea, is it not strongly presumptive that others, in construing the law, not because of the expression of the opinion of the men who framed it but by the analogy of mental operation, would take the same view of the law?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him a question right here in order to get my mind perfectly clear on one point? In looking up the statistics in reference to the available supply in Canada I find that the Dominion has control, in round numbers, of about 700,000 square miles, and the Provinces of about 500,000 square miles. Under the terms of section 2, could not the Dominion of Canada, exercising its prerogative, allow all the products enumerated in the bill under section 2 to come in without regard to what the Provinces might do in the premises?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken in his statement of fact. In the first place, the Dominion Government, as I understand it, has not control of the public lands; they are exclusively under the control of the different Provinces.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand, but I have the differentiation from the Canadian Yearbook. It states explicitly that the Dominion has control of public lands in the Northwest Provinces and territories of about 700,000 square miles, in all of which there is merchantable timber.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will permit me, the Provinces control at least 85 per cent of all the available spruce or pulp wood of the Dominion, and the rest is in private ownership; it is controlled by individuals, and comes in free under section 2 of the pending measure.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This is the point I am making. Held by the Dominion and in private ownership there are about 1,000,000 square miles, while when the Provinces entered the Confederation they retained their land, and it amounts to about a half million square miles. So, if section 2 of the bill were to go into effect, the quantity in private ownership and the Dominion would be a preponderance of this available material.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I hope I may proceed now. When interrogated I was saying the proposition that the agreement which was entered into by the representatives of the Canadian Government and the United States Government was clearly understood before technical objections were raised. I have shown that Mr. Fielding in his speech in Parliament explained it and stated that no paper or pulp wood could come into the United States until we had removed the restrictions from the Canadian paper, and that it meant absolutely free trade between the two countries on these articles when the paper provision became finally operative. At first it would be simply a conditional agreement, and would remain so until Canada removed all her restrictions as to export of paper, board, pulp, and pulp wood.

I have stated that I believe the original agreement contemplated free entry to both countries when it was granted to one, and I believe that section 2 of the bill will be construed by the courts to mean that no paper or pulp of the kind described can come into the United States until there had been a removal of all Canadian restrictions. Something was attempted after the original agreement was presented to the House, and before the House bill was presented. It is an open secret that a Canadian representative was consulted, and after consultation it was agreed that the House bill might be so framed that the United States might become a party with Canada to coerce those Provinces which had imposed export restrictions into removing the same. Is this the part for two nations to take at the beginning of relations which we hope will make for amity and good will?

Mr. Fielding inserted in his letter to Secretary Knox that these provincial regulations were made for what was believed to be right and good for the Provinces, and he said Canada had no desire to change them. Did he mean that it had no desire which it would publicly announce, but that it was willing by trick of wording in a bill to destroy those provisions?

Personally, I do not want to be a party to this clandestine arrangement. I think as well of it as I would think of a plan whereby Canada and this Government should unite to coerce one of our States into relinquishing a right which belonged to it. This action will not facilitate favorable action by Canada. It will retard favorable consideration in the Dominion and plant seeds of distrust rather than those of confidence.

Why was the House amendment brought about? For it is believed that the House did change the original agreement. There were two reasons. One of them was the International Paper Trust and the other was the representative of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, who is receiving from that association $15,000 a year for the purpose of obtaining free print paper. He admitted that that was what he was engaged in doing.

I do not know whether there is a papermakers' trust or not; I do know, however, that there is a statute in such cases made and provided which has proved very efficient in disposing of such matters; I do know that this is not the proper way to deal with a trust. Why, even the great leader of Democracy for the last fifth of a century never advocated this doctrine. He said that where a trust was manufacturing goods he would destroy it by putting articles made abroad in competition with it on the free list.

But this measure does more than that. It does more than put the goods which compete with the products of the trust here on the free list. It puts the competitors of news-print papermakers in this country at a disadvantage with their competitors abroad. It purposely and with malice aforethought gives the Canadian manufacturer an advantage by allowing a free market in which he can purchase his raw material, which market it denies to the American manufacturer. And the worst of this is that the United States is a party to the scheme which so unfairly treats our own industries. It is not the newspaper makers' trust alone which you are punishing. There are only a few of our concerns in this alleged combination, and yet every independent factory is hit with the same bludgeon.

I will submit to the proposition of making our print-paper manufacturers and our wood-pulp manufacturers compete on equal terms with their competitors. I do not want to put them to any disadvantage. But it was urged by some that if we let in a little bit of paper from Canada, because only a small portion can come in under any view of the bill, that that will induce the Provinces to remove their restrictions. It will do nothing of the kind. If a portion of the Canadian products can have a free entry into the United States and keep out all competition from the United States, what reason can Canada have for trying to remove the restriction from the balance of the Provinces and have competition with the United States? Mr. Fielding, in his speech to the Canadian Parliament, from which I have quoted, seems to think that only in lower grades of paper can Canada compete, so that the difference in cost, or selling price at least, can not be great.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TOWNSEND. For a question. I do not want to take too much time.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator. Does not the Senator believe that the owner of private lands, spruce lands, up there, having free access into the United States, being in competition with the man who is leasing the provincial or Crown lands, that are not given free entry into the United States, the competition between these two classes in Canada will present a situation that the Government will take recognition of and put them all, as soon as it can, on an equal basis, being citizens of the same country?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think that is very fanciful. I do not think there is any foundation of reason—at least not to me—in that proposition. It is admitted that the Dominion has no authority over Crown lands in the Provinces; and, besides, there is practically no competition there.

Mr. BROWN. The man who owns timberlands is in competition with the man who leases the Crown lands, is he not, in Canada?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. They are in competition. One has free access to the American market and the other does not have it. Is it not natural to suppose that the Government of both those classes will undertake to fix the law so that they may be on an equality and have the same freedom of our market?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Some of the Provinces have imposed this restriction right in the face of the prospect of having free trade with the United States. I think, if they believe they are good, they are going to hold to them. But can the Senator from Nebraska give me any reason why we are to let paper and wood pulp come from certain Provinces of Canada free into the United States and not demand that those particular Provinces shall admit our products free?

Mr. BROWN. The Senator asks me the question. I think we ought to make the demand, and for one I should welcome the result, but our demands on the Dominion of Canada are at the mercy of Canada. She can answer them or ignore them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. She entered into this arrangement, and our representatives agreed to it, but now Senators desire to complicate it by reading something into it which was never contemplated, never understood. The Root amendment provides just exactly what the Canadian bill provides, namely, that when Canada admits this stuff free into that country, then the products from Canada shall come free into the United States. There is not any doubt but what this was the understanding of the makers of the agreement, and this amendment makes the meaning clear.

But I wish to discuss the second reason, and that was the influence of a representative of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. For myself, sir, believing as I do in Canadian reciprocity, and I hope to give some reasons for that belief to-morrow, I am exceedingly sorry that the newspapers, or certain of them, have not purged themselves of the charge that this is a measure for the benefit of their special interest. We live in an age when the war cry is death to special interests, and the great newspapers, which have been the medium through which this warfare has been carried on, should be the very first to come forward and say, "We want no special benefits." And how small the benefit will be at the most. It would have been better for the influence of the press if it had not asked for an exception in its behalf. I know that all of the newspapers of the country are not parties to this special-favor clause. The lobbyist only represented a few as compared with the whole of the papers, and I personally know that many papers are for this agreement because of principle. They believe in it and support it, because it is right.

If the House amendment is allowed to pass, what are you going to say about other amendments which may be proposed? They will be as much in order as the one incorporated in the House bill.

Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything upon this subject at this time, but I felt it was due to myself that I should give my reasons for supporting this amendment.

We should extend to Canada the same rights and privileges as to print-paper pulp and wood as she grants us—that much and no more. She will respect us more, and we will think better of ourselves if, while granting favors to her, we do justice by our own.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I understood the Senator to say—I am not quoting his exact language—it would be a mistake to grant the newspapers of this country free trade with Canada without Canada giving anything in return. Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Practically that is it.

Mr. NELSON. Then, if he is opposed to free trade in news-print paper, why is he in favor of free trade in farmers' products? Can he explain the difference?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not opposed free trade in news-print paper. I want free trade in news-print paper. That is what I am contending for. I am contending that the agreement as it is interpreted by gentlemen who want to get some advantage out of it is not free trade, but it is free trade in the United States for Canada and it is a prohibition to the United States in Canada.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me? Is it not exactly the same in effect? In other words, section 2 lets in Canadian paper free into this country, as it is worded to-day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. A little of it.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; the product of private lands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what they claim for it. I think the courts will hold it does not, but I would remove all doubt——

Mr. NELSON. If it admits paper free, why should those who are in favor of that policy insist on having the farm products of Canada come in free?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator expect that Canada will furnish our farmers any market for our agricultural products—our wheat, oats, barley, and flax?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am going to discuss the question of reciprocity to-morrow. I hope I shall be able to give some reason for the faith I have in me that the Canadian reciprocity bill is in accordance with the principles of a protective policy as I have always understood it and as I have always advocated it. I do not care to-day to enter into that discussion. I am now simply discussing, or have tried to discuss, the question as it relates to print paper. I believe the intent of the makers of this agreement was right. I believe the notions which have been read into it by certain gentlemen who are opposed to the Root amendment are wrong. The original agreement was one between the two countries and for the whole of those countries. It was intended to be reciprocal. Why not make it so beyond all doubt?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I only want to say a few words in regard to the so-called Root amendment. I have been in the Senate for some years and have differed with almost everybody in the Senate and outside of the Senate; but I have always insisted upon one thing, and that was that we should put in legislation just what we intended—good, bad, or indifferent as it might result.

I have listened to arguments upon the Root amendment, and I can see no relation between the Root amendment and the obscurity that is in the pending bill. The pending bill provides, in section 2, that paper and its attendant commodities of a certain character and value shall be admitted into the United States on conditions precedent. Those conditions precedent, which I need not enumerate, are conditions over which the Canadian Parliament has no more authority than has the Congress of the United States, being subject entirely and exclusively to the control of the parliaments or governing bodies of the Provinces.

I contend that under that provision, with those conditions precedent, the fair conclusion is that no paper—because it is referred to as "such paper," and what does "such paper" mean except the paper described in the bill?—that no paper or its attendant commodities can be received into this country without duty so long as such paper, print paper, and other paper, not to exceed 4 cents a pound in value, finds any restriction anywhere in Canada. If I could have my way, Mr. President, if we have reached an economic development where we can put Canadian paper on the free list, I would strike out those conditions precedent, just as I urged two years ago, that so far as we reduced the duty on paper, we should strike out those conditions precedent, because to maintain those conditions precedent amounts to levying two taxes on the paper when we have reached the point where we concede that paper should come into this country free.

I have offered an amendment, with that object, which is pending. However, I recognize the conditon—that the newspapers in this country have been led to believe that under this language as it is now framed, as the bill passed the other House, they are going to get free print paper; and I understand, as well as we understand anything in this world, that the effort to strike out those restrictions, those conditions precedent, will be misinterpreted and purposely misconstrued, and knowing also the futility of the attempt, I shall not press the proposition in connection with this bill; but when we reach the free-list bill I am going to renew the effort where it will be beyond the power of any representative of any interest, through misguided followers of his, to misinterpret and misrepresent the position in which I am placed. So, to avoid any confusion as to that, I shall not press the amendment to this bill at this time.

Believing that this bill in its present form, where it purports to give America free paper, is a deception, a delusion, and a snare, I am not going to join in another deception, delusion, and snare, which I believe the Root amendment to be, and it is needless to say I do not impute the purpose to its author, but I do insist that it is delusive. The Root amendment, as has been repeated here time and time again, does not relate to the restrictive provisions in this bill. The Root amendment simply relates to a certain thing over which the Parliament of Canada has absolute jurisdiction, namely, the importation of American paper into Canada, which, for economic reasons, can not successfully be done. The Root amendment provides, in addition to those conditions precedent, that when they occur and "when the President makes proclamation, that moment paper is admitted into Canada free, then Canadian paper shall be admitted into this country." What has that to do with the question of these conditions precedent now in the bill, upon which depends the exportation of paper from Canada to this country? Absolutely nothing. They deal with a matter that is absolutely in the power of the Canadian Parliament, because the Canadian Parliament alone can impose import duties upon paper coming from this or any other country into the Canadian market.

It is said, however, that unless we get access to the Canadian market in consideration of Canada getting access to our market it is not reciprocity. Well, Mr. President, that does not embarrass me in the slightest, for I undertake to say that there is no element of reciprocity in this bill. It is the same old plan of Canada—and I admire Canada for adhering to the maxim that "charity begins at home"—maintaining her duties, as her great minister stated in the speech quoted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], where we might compete with her, but asking us to take our duties down where she can compete with us.

Last year I roughly estimated this, and I find that we exported $300,000 worth of paper, pulp, and wood into Canada, while Canada exported $4,000,000 worth into this country. I will not be a party to the travesty of calling it a reciprocal obligation or a reciprocal condition where experience has demonstrated our utter inability to compete with that market, on condition that they have our market. There is but one justification for taking this duty off of paper, and that is in the economic development of this country we have reached a point where we owe it to the consumers of paper to remove the duty. If that consideration does not exist, it is a travesty on statesmanship to talk of trading a market that only takes $300,000 worth of our products against our market taking $4,000,000 of theirs and calling it reciprocity.

As I believe section 2 of the bill as it now stands is a fraud and a deception upon the paper users of this country, so I believe the Root amendment is a fraud and deception—of course not intentionally on the part of the Senator from New York—but a fraud and deception upon the paper makers of this country, because it assumes to give reciprocal rights, when, from an economic standpoint, it is so self-evident we can not compete. As I do not propose to vote for this bill, thinking as I do, that it is a fraud and deception upon the consumers of this country, so I do not propose to vote for an amendment that is a fraud and deception upon the American manufacturer. Therefore, for one, I shall vote against this so-called Root amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to feel entirely sure that I really was not at cross-purposes on the legal question with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I have great confidence in his legal acumen. I understood him—I may be wrong—to base his argument upon the supposed fact that the Provinces of Canada could impose an export duty.

Mr. CLAPP. No; on the contrary, I stated—and that has confused this whole argument, the idea that the Root amendment went to what the Provinces of Canada could do—that the Provinces could not impose either an export or an import duty.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator will find, when he reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-morrow morning, that he did not use the term "export." He said the Provinces could not impose an import duty; that the Dominion only could do it. But I think the Senator, of course, intended to——

Mr. CLAPP. In that connection, I only used the word "import" because I was dealing merely with the Root amendment, which relates to the importation into Canada of American paper. The Senator is right in my use of the word.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; because it would make a vast difference in arriving at a conclusion in regard to this matter, as to whether or not we were at the mercy of the Provinces in any regard. We are not at the mercy of the Provinces in any respect whatever, because the constitution of Canada authorizes the Dominion Parliament to remove any such embarrassment.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me a question at this point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to correct what I think was a misapprehension of the Senator from Idaho the other day. The Dominion Government has control over duties and customs. It has no control of the timber lands of the Provinces. I have here before me, if the Senator will allow me to quote it, the act of March 29, 1867, the British act of Thirtieth Victoria, chapter 3, establishing the Dominion Government of Canada. This act may be cited as the British North American act. I repeat, it is the act establishing the Dominion Government, and, as it were, the constitution under which that Government exists. I read from that act as follows:

EXCLUSIVE POWERS OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES.

92. In each Province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say. * * *

Paragraph 5 reads as follows:

5. The management and sale of the public lands belonging to the Province and of the timber and wood thereon.

That gives the provincial legislatures exclusive jurisdiction over the timber lands or the lands owned by the Provinces. There can not be any doubt about it. That is the construction put in paragraph 10 of the letter of Messrs. Fielding and Paterson addressed to Secretary Knox.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I had before me, and I have now, the same section to which the Senator has called the attention of the Senate. I imagine it is punctuated the same. It reads:

The management and sale of the public lands belonging to the Province and of the timber and wood thereon.

That is all one sentence. That is to say, they may legislate relative to the management and sale of it. The Provinces do not own it. The Dominion of Canada pays to each Province a bonus in lieu of the timber surrendered. But we do not need to go out into that field, because it is a wide one and it is coupled with a vast amount of legislation and regulation. We only need to go to the question of power.

When I referred to this matter it was in connection with a statement that was being read, in which it was stated, not that Canada did not have the power, but that she did not have the right. When we came to analyze the subject then under consideration, we found that they were not using the word "right" as synonymous with "power." They were referring to it in an ethical sense as to what Canada should do, rather than what she might do with her Provinces; and it was in that connection that I read the section referred to by the Senator.

I think it must be admitted that Canada has absolute control, and in fact that Canada can alone make laws and regulations for carrying laws into effect with reference to either exports or imports. The provision is in the fifth paragraph of the section read by the Senator—section 91—and it is in language that our Constitution uses, and would be subject to the same construction. The main difference between the constitution of Canada and that of the United States is that in Canada no powers run to the Provinces except by express provision, while in our country no powers run to the Government except by express provision. It is just reversing the proposition. So that the presumption is always the other way as between the two countries. We must construe their constitutional provisions as ours are construed, because their constitution was drawn with the Constitution of the United States in the mind of the party who was drawing it. It became operative just after the war, when this Government was in the saddle, and probably for that reason our Constitution was taken as a criterion in drawing that of Canada. They were four years putting it in force after it was first drawn, and during those four years the British Government professed to entertain some doubt as to just what the result of the war then pending would be, and it was dallied with.

Mr. President, I do not imagine that any Senator is contending at all that the reservation expressed in lines 19 and 20, on page 23, refers to any act that may be done or may not be done by a Province. It refers only to the acts and the power of the Dominion of Canada, and must be read in connection with the fifth article of section 91 of the constitution of Canada, because it is dealing with that subject. We have got to read them together. Had this intended to have any reference whatever to the Provinces it would have said at the end of it "made by any Province thereof." It does not do so. It starts out by referring to what Canada as a Dominion can do, and it does not change that relation to the end. It would have been proper and convenient, had it intended to refer to any provincial power or right, to have said "any restriction which any Province may impose"; but it retained the reference to the Dominion from beginning to end.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. It seems to me that any court or tribunal dealing with this question and interpreting it could not be blind to the fact that under the laws of Canada the charges imposed under license contracts are not charges regulated by the Parliament, but by the local provincial governments.

Mr. HEYBURN. That terminates at the line of Canada. There is a provision in the Canadian constitution regulating commerce between the Provinces of Canada; and when it is dealing with that subject it leaves no doubt of the fact that it is referring to and confining the reference to the Provinces, but when it deals with the Dominion, then those rights run to the line.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not want to anticipate the Senator, but do I understand that he is contending that this alone applies to the conditions attached by the Parliament?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. There is not a mention or a reference, directly or indirectly, in section 2 to the Provinces. It deals only with the Dominion. How you get a Province into section 2 I do not know.

Mr. CLAPP. Because it refers to the contractual limitations that are well known in both countries—it does not make any difference whether they are known there, but they are known here to exist in Canada with reference to the authority of the provincial governments.

Mr. HEYBURN. To do what?

Mr. CLAPP. To impose these restrictions?

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. CLAPP. And license fees.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; we have the language here, "the management and sale of the public lands belonging to the Province and of the timber and wood thereon." It acts as the agency of the Dominion in that respect.

Mr. CLAPP. But, Mr. President, we all know from our examination of contracts covering those lands and we know from the declaration of the minister of Canada that the construction which they place upon their law is that the Provinces can impose those restrictions, and surely our courts would be bound by that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I assume that the Senator has come into close contact with those contracts. I can say that in the course of my professional career as a lawyer I have handled a great many of them, because I live very close to the line and it is a very ordinary business transaction in our country; so that I have some personal knowledge of the matter. But those are contractual relations and have nothing to do with the basic right or the limitations upon the Dominion Government. The Dominion Government of Canada deals with its Provinces in an irregular or uneven manner. It will grant a right to one and withhold it from another.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, this expressly says—or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly).

It does seem to me, with all deference to the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator is reading from——

Mr. CLAPP. From the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. But you must find a corresponding power in the Constitution. The bill does not fix—it is not even argumentative as to the status of the law.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I understand the Senator that in construing the bill we are wasting our time in considering the terms of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. You must certainly go to the organic law under which the bill must operate, if it operates at all, because in this legislative proceeding, while it is really an ordinary piece of legislation upon the tariff question——

Mr. CLAPP. I agree to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is an attempt being made all the time to construe it as a treaty. It is not a treaty because it has not been submitted to the treaty-making power of the Government for consideration. So I am discussing it entirely from the standpoint of a legislative measure, and not from the standpoint of a treaty at all. The Dominion of Canada by treaty may do many things, as we may, that can not be done by legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. That my silence may not be construed hereafter, I will say that I most heartily agree with the Senator that this is in no sense a treaty. It is just an ordinary, or rather an extraordinary, tariff bill——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it is a pact.

Mr. CLAPP. An attempt to bolster up certain trusts by taking the duty off the raw material and leaving it on the trust products and leaving the people to pay the expense.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before adjournment a few days ago I called attention to this question, it being late in the day, in order that if it should catch the notice of some Senators here they might be thinking about it until the meeting of the Senate to-day. I called attention to the nature of this proposed arrangement by reading from the resolution before the Canadian Parliament a matter that I have not heard referred to, but doubtless every Senator has seen it and has had it in mind. It proposes that Canada shall be our almoner hereafter in regard to our markets. She may give them away at her pleasure.

Now, I will ask close attention to the provision, because it is in the resolution that is before the Canadian Parliament, which was introduced by Mr. Fielding in the Committee of Ways and Means. That is their medium in such matters as is the similar committee in our House of Representatives. In the second paragraph of article 2 it is provided:

That the advantages hereby granted to the United States shall extend to any and every other foreign power which may be entitled thereto under the provisions of any treaty or convention with His Majesty.

That leaves it open for the King of England, acting either on behalf of the English Government proper or acting through the Canadian agency, to make our competition in Canada so broad that we must meet the people from Italy or Abyssinia or Patagonia or anywhere else in the Canadian market on equal terms, because it reserves the right to extend the same terms to France or Germany or England or any other country.

That the advantages hereby granted to the United States—

This is another, a separate and distinct provision—

That the advantages hereby granted to the United States shall extend to the United Kingdom and the several British colonies—

That lets meat from Australia in all right—and possessions with respect to their commerce with Canada—

We have got to meet them, and we have nothing to say about it. We do not say whether they shall come into Canada. Canada says that or the English Government says it—with respect to their commerce with Canada: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be held to increase any rate of duty now provided for in the British preferential tariff.

They preserve everything that they have and gather something new to them, and they take away from us all that they could possibly take away from us; that is, a protected market. They sell to us in our protected market and derive the benefits of our protective duties, but we go into their market and we sell in competition with anybody whom they may choose to admit to it on exactly the same terms. That is the favored-nation clause by legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, in order that we may have a little more light upon the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, which is most pertinent at this time, I desire to read a quotation from the premier of Canada published in the Washington Star:

LONDON, June 17.

At a luncheon of the Constitutional Club, presided over by A. J. Balfour, to-day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, premier of Canada, told the big gathering of British statesmen and over-seas premiers that the reciprocity agreement between the United States and Canada need cause no alarm to anyone.

"Canada," he said, "wished to trade with the mother country in preference to any other land, but that did not mean that it should treat with her alone. Whatever privileges were granted to other countries would be given equally to England."

"In England," he added, "the policy of British preference has been hoisted to the top of the mast, and there it will stay, whatever Great Britain does or does not do."

There has never been in the history of the British Empire a stronger feeling of kinship among her subjects or a greater desire to work in harmony with and coordinate with the constituent parts of that Empire than exists to-day among the dependencies of Great Britain, and in no part of their vast domain, stretching from ocean to ocean, are there subjects who are encouraging with a greater degree of enthusiasm or more intelligent purpose the investment of British funds for the development of colonial industries than in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that that extract from a newspaper correctly expresses the question from the Canadian standpoint.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we might take in connection with that statement of the premier, the announcement that the farmers in western Canada declared on Saturday night that, if they did not get reciprocity, they were in favor of annexation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been at so many of those little joy occasions over in western Canada and in the Northwest Territory that I know just exactly how that sentiment of annexation will grow. They will talk enthusiastically and they sing "For he is a jolly good fellow," and they are for annexation there, but there is nothing serious about that kind of Canadian annexation.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt the spirit of joy was more prevalent this summer at the meeting of the western farmers.

Mr. HEYBURN. This question of the meeting of farmers and mechanics and these people generally resolves itself down to some small gathering of people where they do not meet perhaps for the purpose of considering this particular question. I eliminate entirely the question of annexation. I think it is just a waste of time to talk about annexation with Canada, except it is occasioned through war, which is not likely at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. One view taken by the Senator from Idaho has interested me very much. It is not the view taken by most of those who have spoken upon the question; but if it is well founded, it is highly necessary that we understand it and know it before we act, even upon this amendment.

I may misunderstand the Senator from Idaho, but if I correctly apprehend him, it is that there is no restriction or limitation upon the export of wood or wood pulp or paper from Canada into the United States that the Dominion Parliament can not remove.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is not. There is no export duty from any Province or the Dominion of Canada affecting these questions. There is no export duty. Now, duty is one thing; license is another.

Mr. CUMMINS. Without speaking now about paper especially, the Senator from Idaho is mistaken. There is an export duty on logs from Canada into the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a license.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has all the meaning, I think, of an export duty. But I should really like to believe, as the Senator from Idaho does, that if the Parliament of Canada passes a law to that effect, then there may be the export of wood, pulp, and paper into the United States free from any of the limitations or restrictions——

Mr. HEYBURN. Of the Dominion Parliament?

Mr. CUMMINS (continuing). Put upon the management of the Crown lands by the Provinces.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is that the view of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Dominion Parliament has the last say.

There is a most suggestive provision in the constitution here, I will, in passing, read section 132:

The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any Province thereof—

Bear this in mind, because it is important—or of any Province thereof, as part of the British Empire—

If Canada deals with foreign countries, she does it as a part of the British Empire, and she may brush aside any provincial agreement or regulation which would be valid enough if everybody acquiesced in it. But whenever the question comes whether the Government interests are to be affected by it, then this provision comes in. You see, by going back to the seat of the power, you are enabled to unravel that question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I want to connect that up with another section. I will first read section 132 of the constitution from the beginning in order to make it clear.

The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any Province thereof, as part of the British Empire, toward foreign countries, arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

Now, suppose this were a treaty; would there be any question that such a power behind these Provinces could absolutely control them?

Now, another provision here in connection with that:

The customs and excise laws—

Now, that log law would come under that excise probably.

Mr. CUMMINS. The export duty.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not an export duty. They use those terms, of course, without regard to the strength of them. They call an excise duty an export duty perhaps, or anything without regard to its technical meaning.

Now, here is section 122:

The customs and excise laws of each Province shall, subject to the provisions of this act—

That is the other provision I have just read—continue in force until altered by the Parliament of Canada.

No one can contend that under the constitution of Canada the Dominion Government can not grant power to a Province to make an excise law. She can grant power to the Province what may be called the equivalent to an excise law. But the power that grants it can take it back.

Until altered by the Parliament of Canada.

These things exist——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to Schedule A, which is attached to the correspondence between the departments of the two Governments?

I will not even read the entire paragraph I have in mind, but I simply bring it to the attention of the Senate. It is the one which says that—

Provided, That such paper and board, valued at 4 cents per pound or less, and wood pulp, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise) or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly) shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

Now, those are the conditions which stand in the way, if this bill were to go into effect, of the full and free admission of wood, pulp, and paper into the United States from Canada. I want to be sure that I understand the Senator with respect to it. I do understand he says that if the Parliament of Canada desired to do it it could at any moment pass such a law as would remove all such limitations, restrictions, or regulations referred to in the paragraph which I have just read.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no government, that I know of, which has the power to make a law which has not the power to repeal it.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that the Senator from Idaho understands that it is the Dominion Parliament which stands in the way——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; because it does not want to——

Mr. CUMMINS. Of complete free trade between the United States and Canada in wood, wood pulp, and paper?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; because she expresses a desire not to disturb the contractual relations which she has made with her Provinces. But that does not mean she has not the power to do it. She prefers not to do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. How does the Senator from Idaho reconcile that with this sentence in the letter of Messrs. Fielding and Paterson?

They—

referring to these restrictions—

They have been adopted by several of the Provinces with regard to what are believed to be Provincial interests. We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the Provincial authorities.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not say they have not the "power." They differentiate there and use the word "right," a very cautious one, because they have already enumerated the method by which these arrangements were made. They were made with the consent of the Dominion Government, which, of course, could be taken back, because it is not in the shape of a constitution, and if it was they could repeal the constitution granted to the Province.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator allow me to finish the sentence?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I beg pardon if I have interrupted.

Mr. CUMMINS (reading)—

We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the Provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administration of their public lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, of course, a general statement. It is not directed to any point. It is a general statement when it refers to that. They have not a moral right, perhaps, to abrogate a contract. But they have the power. They can, of course, repeal a constitutional provision of the Province because they make the constitutions for the Provinces.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Dominion Parliament can not repeal the act of 1867.

Mr. HEYBURN. That came from the English Parliament.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. Permit me to read and emphasize the section which was called to the Senator's attention by the Senator from Minnesota, and I say frankly——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it before me.

Mr. CUMMINS. I say frankly, if the Senator from Idaho could convince the Senate that it lies within the power of the Dominion Parliament to remove all these restrictions, the inference would be inevitable that whoever made this agreement has not been dealing fairly and frankly with the American people.

But now allow me to read. Section 92 says:

In each Province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is, to say—

Now, if I understand that correctly, it is that the Dominion Parliament is excluded entirely from the powers that are herein enumerated.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Coming, then, to the fifth paragraph——

Mr. HEYBURN. The original Provinces.

Mr. CUMMINS. Coming to the fifth paragraph, we read:

The management and sale of the public lands belonging to the Province, and of the timber and wood thereon.

I have always thought——

Mr. HEYBURN. What Provinces?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Province; whatever Province is exercising the power here referred to—

The management and sale of the public lands belonging to the Province, and of the timber and wood thereon.

Now, I do not believe that the Parliament of Canada can repeal or regulate or control the action of the Province in dealing with the sale and the management of the public lands or the timber or the wood upon those lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not say anything about "action."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has interpolated the word "action" there. This simply says that they may make laws with reference to—

The management and sale of the public lands belonging to the Province, and of the timber and wood thereon.

That is to say, they may make laws as to the terms and conditions upon which they may be sold. But that has nothing to do with exports or imports.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am just coming to that. The management and sale of timber upon the lands belonging to the Provinces.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now——

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, suppose that the Province of Ontario should make an agreement or pass a law under which an agreement should be made with the Senator from Idaho, providing that no part of the timber cut from the land so granted to him should be exported to the United States or any other country and that no part of the wood pulp which might be manufactured out of the wood should be exported and that no paper which might be the product of the wood should be exported. Does the Senator from Idaho believe that the Parliament of Canada could repeal or override the agreement or the contract so made?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the English Parliament or the English Government had made that limitation——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am speaking now of the limitation made by the Province.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was not made by the Province. That was made in favor of the Provinces named—four:

The following provisions of this act respecting the Parliament of Canada, namely, the provisions relating to appropriation and tax bills, the recommendations of money votes, the assent to bills, the disallowance of acts, and the signification of pleasure on bills reserved, shall extend and apply to the legislatures of the several Provinces as if those provisions were here reenacted and made applicable in terms to the respective Provinces and the legislatures thereof, with the substitution of the lieutenant governor of the Province for the governor general, of the governor general for the Queen, and for a secretary of state, of one year for two years, and of the Province for Canada.

That is as to the four Provinces; that is, Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario, and New Brunswick; and those are Provinces which are expressly named to which these provisions apply.

Then there was the unorganized Northwest Territory, which came in; they were authorized to admit it very much as our Government is authorized to create new States..

Mr. CUMMINS. They have been admitted since 1867.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what the constitution was framed for—for the purpose of bringing them in under the course commenced in 1864 and consummated in 1867.

Now, that was the only territory subject to these laws until new Provinces were organized out of the unorganized territory, subject to just such limitations as our Territories were. And then Canada, not England, admitted these new Provinces, not acting through the English Parliament, but acting through her own Dominion Parliament, and she placed the restrictions upon them, and they are entirely different from those placed upon the original four Provinces.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am speaking, of course, of the act of 1867——

Mr. HEYBURN. You have to divide the territory to apply that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Which is the constitution, as the Senator from Idaho very well states——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And in it it is declared that in each the legislature—that is, in all the Provinces which make up the Dominion of Canada——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; those four.

Mr. CUMMINS. The legislature may exclusively make laws in relation thereto.

Now, I come along to section 5, in relation to the management and sale of public lands belonging to the Provinces and of the timber and wood thereon. If the Province has the exclusive right so to legislate, so to manage, so to sell, it seems hard for me to believe that the Dominion Parliament can repeal the laws the Province has so made and abrogate the contract which has been entered into under existing laws.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was a power of legislation within the Province. The preceding pages indicate that clearly.

Now, I ask the Senator's close attention to this: To indicate clearly that they were not dealing with the question of the regulation of trade and commerce outside of the Province, we find in the preceding section they had first dealt with the power of the Government to regulate commerce and trade as we do in the Constitution.

Having disposed of that, now we come to the regulation of internal affairs, and in the next section, 92, they take up that question—as to the regulation of internal affairs—and provide, properly, that it shall be done through the internal machinery of the Government. Here they were dealing with Dominion power and Dominion machinery of the Government; and they disposed of them completely. Then they come to the next—the heading of it being "Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures." They had already parted with or located the power to regulate commerce and trade—trade and commerce; they just reverse the language of our Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought this ought to appeal to the Senator.

In making laws for a great country they first deal with the country itself. Our Constitution does. It deals with the country as a single organic proposition. When it has disposed of that it takes up the subdivisions of it and deals with the Provinces. Now, following that, it deals with the Territories; following that, with the unorganized territories. That is the ordinary procedure.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to correct, I think, a misstatement or misapprehension?

It has been stated that this North American act, really the constitution of the Dominion of Canada, included only the four Provinces which were created at the time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and it names them.

Mr. NELSON. And then it provides that the others can be admitted only by Canada.

Now, let me read the next to the last paragraph of this act:

146. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honorable privy council——

That is the privy council of England—on addresses from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the Colonies or Provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those Colonies or Provinces, or any of them, into the union, and on addresses from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada to admit Ruperts Land and the Northwestern Territory.

Ruperts Land and the Northwestern Territory are now what constitute the three Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Nova Scotia.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is the section the Senator is reading 147?

Mr. NELSON. No; 146.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, there is another section——

Mr. NELSON. Will you allow me to finish the statement?

At the time of the admission there were Canada—known as Upper and Lower Canada—and Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. Canada was by this act divided into the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Upper Canada was called Ontario and Lower Canada Quebec. And, then, there were New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. They were in the union originally, and the others have been put into it on a par exactly with the other Provinces. They are all in it, except the Province of Newfoundland, which is outside, which never entered into the Dominion.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is the difference between our Constitution and Canada's. They are not required to be all on the same footing.

Mr. CUMMINS. This history is very interesting and important, too, but——

Mr. HEYBURN. It is essential absolutely to be considered.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I do not wish to drift away from the question I rose to propound. We find here a constitution which the Senator from Idaho well says is a constitution of grants. That is, the powers of the Provinces bear close relation to the powers granted to the United States. You must find in the constitution the powers exercised in order to warrant the Province in exercising them.

Now, we find here a power, and it is an exclusive power, granted to the Provinces, to legislate with respect to the management and sale of the lands of the Provinces and the wood timber thereon. It seems to me that under such a grant it would be legally or constitutionally impossible for the Parliament of Canada by her own act to withdraw the powers that had been granted to the Provinces or to overrule or repeal any legislation which the Provinces had made within those powers.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not contend that she can. But let us get back on to the track.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will get you back or I will get myself back by asking this question finally: The Senator from Idaho, upon a review of the whole matter, believes, and he asserts, that if the Dominion Parliament were to-morrow to pass a law removing all limitations and restrictions which prevent the free export of wood, pulp, or paper into the United States the act would be valid?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And would accomplish its object?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it can do it either by act or by treaty.

Mr. CUMMINS. And therefore the proposition of the Dominion of Canada to defer our entrance into Canada until all the Provinces act or until, at some future distant day, wood and pulp and paper are put on an equality with our wood and pulp and paper is a mere pretense.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, just call it a subterfuge, because that is what it amounts to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Subterfuge?

Mr. HEYBURN. Or whatever it may be called.

Mr. CUMMINS. I see now the Senator's position. I did not——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator sees it pretty near. I think I can open the door entirely.

We have in this country a case somewhat in point. Texas reserved in the treaty the power to dispose of her lands. Texas came to us by treaty, and she is given the power to regulate the sale of lands and of the timber thereon. Could she put an export duty on the timber or anything connected with it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared——

Mr. HEYBURN. It points the idea.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should say, instantly, no; because the Constitution of the United States forbids any State from doing any such thing.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the Constitution does not forbid it, but it retains to itself the power to do that thing; and the thing which the Constitution retains the right or the power to do can not be exercised by anybody else.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the exact equivalent of what I said. The exclusive power to do those things, as levying duties on imports, is conferred upon the Federal Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Idaho further speaks—I am going to sit down after I read this—I want him to have in mind section 109 of the act of 1867, which provides that:

All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties——

Mr. HEYBURN. That merely goes to the title to the land.

Mr. CUMMINS (reading)—

shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any trust existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the Province in the same.

Mr. HEYBURN. That does not get within a mile of the question we are discussing.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator ought to have the full title of these lands before him——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it right here.

Mr. CUMMINS. When he speaks of the powers of the Provinces.

Mr. HEYBURN. It can not be successfully contended that the power to manage a piece of real property—and that is all this amounts to—carries with it the power to levy an export or import duty or to exercise any other kind of a governmental function. That certainly does not need to be supported by any argument. We have those cases in point in our own country, and no one has ever contended they would have the right to control those duties.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is rapidly convincing me; but the whole legislation of the last session respecting paper and of this session respecting paper seems to have been bottomed on the idea that there were valid limitations and restrictions over there that the General Government of Canada could not remove.

Mr. HEYBURN. I always object to bringing in the question of personal equation, but I have been talking with Canadians and Americans since last winter in regard to the matter, and I have listened to what we on this side call "bluffs," and their statements that "the Dominion Government will always protect the Province in its own rules and regulations and will not undertake to control us," and all that kind of talk.

I have here a letter in this morning's mail, by the way—one of them—from a man who objects to the expression I used the other day which was as true as the Gospel, that whatever political rights we ever got from England we received on the point of a bayonet. That stirred him up to write to me about this. I am fortunate in having a considerable acquaintance on that side of the line and considerable clientele there, and I know something of how they feel. They use those laws as a bludgeon to defend themselves, not against the imposition of others but to afford them an excuse for not doing something. They say, "It can not be done because the legislature last winter passed a certain act," and if they have not passed the act they will see that it does in order to bear them out.

The management of property does not carry with it that right. I do not care whether it is in the hands of a Province, or an individual, or the Government itself; it is the lordship, the lord of the fee, so to speak, applying our relative terms, who does these things. Some of them it can delegate; some it can not. Canada can only delegate power within the license given it by the act of 1867. England can delegate power to whom it pleases, because it has no constitutions to limit it. Our Government can not delegate power except within the limit of the permission contained in the contract of the Constitution. The right to exercise power is an affirmative right. When it comes to a government the right of a State is not the government of the highest character. It can be a definite power conferred upon a State that authorizes it to act upon matters in which the General Government is concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask one more question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the Senator from Idaho owned 160 acres of timberland, and I were trying to secure from him the right to cut it and remove it, and the Senator from Idaho would attach as a condition to the sale of the timber that I must convert it into lumber upon the land from which it is cut.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is purely contractual.

Mr. CUMMINS. That, however, is a valid contract. The Senator from Idaho admits that?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I have seen those contracts.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Provinces have entered into such contracts, in substance, with persons who are taking timber from these lands, I take it the Dominion Parliament could not abrogate those contracts. But the Senator's idea is that the Parliament could prevent the Provinces from entering into any more of them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; or you declare that after a certain date no such contract should be made. We have instances of that in our own legislation, where after a certain date no contract within certain prohibitions should be made. That is the position, I take it, in regard to this matter. But I am not going to vote for the Root amendment because I am opposed to reciprocity. Section 2 is not a reciprocal measure, and no one has contended that it had anything in it of the character of reciprocity. However, if you are to say the Root amendment uses reciprocity, I am not in favor of it. Of course, if I wanted to use it as a bludgeon that would be another proposition, but I am not in a belligerent mood and I am not going to vote for an amendment like that because it might hurt somebody.

It has been held up to us here for weeks and months that you could not do it because, forsooth, some Province would bar your way. Since I read the constitution of Canada I have not been at all influenced by that statement.

By the way, I find here a memorandum I made with reference to the question we have had under consideration here. Speaking of these exclusive rights that the Dominion Government gave to the Provinces it says:

> The legislatures of the Provinces and of the Dominion possess concurrent jurisdiction on many subjects, because the Dominion has given them jurisdiction concurrent with itself; and it is provided that in the contingency of a conflict of legislation between the Dominion and the Provinces, the laws of the Dominion shall prevail. Although the powers of government have in this manner been definitely portioned out, there has been no lack of intrusion on the part of either party into the sphere of the other. On such occasions, where compromise has been found impossible, the principle of the superior authority inherent in the central government has been adhered to.

In the management of litigation in that country it is not at all infrequent that we find a conflict between the Dominion authority and the territory. I always speak of the provincial authority. They were not Provinces when I knew them; they were mere territories; but the local authority was frequently in conflict with the Dominion authority, each contending for that which was favorable to them, but always the Dominion authority prevailed, and properly so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When the Senator made the statement the other day I was very much inclined to agree with his construction of the Canadian act, but I am not entirely certain that I now understand the Senator's position. Does the Senator from Idaho think that, notwithstanding the provision of the constituent act, which gives to the Provinces named exclusive power to sell and manage their land and the wood grown thereon, if the Provinces under that power should undertake to say that wood grown upon the land could not be exported to the United States, the Dominion Parliament could set that provision aside under the power which the Dominion Parliament has to alter the customs and excise law?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I say not only under that authority, but under the regulations, a purely local one within the Provinces.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the customs and excise laws are taxing laws. We have the same expression in our own Constitution. Those words are used with reference to the taxing power.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; as distinguished from duties.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But we also have in our Constitution a provision which gives Congress the power to make rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States and to dispose of the public lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not an excise law. That is an act of sovereignty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is exactly in line with what I was going to say. It is not a customs or excise law when we pass a law under that power. When the Provincial Parliament passes a law for the purpose of regulating the sale or management of its lands or the wood arising therefrom, that is an act of sovereignty on the part of that Provincial Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will hear me through, that is not a taxing law at all. The question I wanted to submit to the Senator was, Can the Dominion Parliament control the sovereign power of the provincial government to sell and manage its lands under a taxing power?

Mr. HEYBURN. The same as we do it under the Carey Act. There is the point. You see, the Government having the sovereign power, delegates it to the State to sell and make the deeds under the Carey Act. There is no difficulty about the legal proposition, because this limits it to the things that the State may do, and the States here have no rights except those expressly given.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The provincial government under that power could decline to sell any of the wood grown upon the public lands at all if they desired to do it, could they not?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the right to regulate a thing does not at all mean that you may abolish it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The exclusive power to sell or to manage is vested in the provincial government. Under that exclusive power it may withhold from sale.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it may not. This says the management and sale. When the power is given to sell a thing it does not carry with it the power to sell it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me grant that. The power to sell certainly includes the power to sell to whomsoever the person having the power chooses to sell.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, yes; so as not to defeat the purpose of the lord of the fee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Could not the provincial parliament decline to sell to another government if it desired to do so?

Mr. HEYBURN. They do not sell to the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To sell to the people?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not the Government that sells to the people. It comes from the person who buys the claim under the Government. Canada does not cut off the wood. They grant a license to cut it or sell the land to a purchaser. It is purely an individual and contractual relation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I quite understand that, but the Provincial Government by its laws has the power exclusively to control the sale.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Government does not buy it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has not heard me through. I have not intimated that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say a provincial government having exclusive power to manage and sell the wood grown upon these lands would have the power to sell to whomsoever it pleases.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Would it not have the power to decline to sell to the people of some particular Government if it desired to do so?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is possible; but I do not see how it enters into this question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it enters exactly into it.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the first place, the Government does not sell the land at all. The Government gives the man the right to earn this land.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If it has the power to decline to sell to the people of this Government, then has it not the lesser power to decline to sell upon conditions or to say that a certain license shall be paid before it shall be cut for sale?

Mr. HEYBURN. A license is a hire; it is not a sale. When the word "sale" is used, it can not be construed to include that kind of a departure by title. A license is a right to use a thing. A sale parts with the title; it severs the title from the lord of the fee in whatever shape it may be. The Government had in the previous section disposed of the thing Senators are arguing for. There are just one of two conclusions, either section 91 does not apply to foreign trade and commerce or else article 5 of section 92 has no application one way or the other. When the constitution, proceeding in an orderly manner, has disposed of one question and passes to the next, you can not ingraft the second question upon the power that is dealt with in the first.

I do not care whether any export duty is charged or not, and I care not whether an import duty is charged, it is foreign trade and commerce that regulates the passing of commodities between the countries. Whether upon the payment of dues or not, it is commerce, because the value of the article itself is being transferred. That is of more importance than the price that you pay for transferring it from one to the other. That is the commerce that is referred to in section 91, and the question is there disposed of and closed. Then it passes to the consideration of domestic affairs. It is only in connection with domestic affairs, so far as section 92 deals and provides, that the Provinces may regulate them. Those Provinces charge each other for certain privileges, but whenever it comes to giving the rule under which the commodity crosses the border, then the Dominion of Canada, subject even now to the Crown of England, regulates that so far as they are concerned, and our Government so far as we are concerned. It would be a very grave mistake to conclude that the provisions for domestic commerce in any manner influenced or governed the subject matter under consideration through this bill. You could not make a graver mistake, and I trust that Senators will give it the closest attention. If we are governed by a wrong rule, we will reach a wrong conclusion in this case.

Now, I want to resume on the point I was discussing just for a moment before I close, and I have spoken longer than I had any intention of doing. I want the attention of Senators to this provision. While I have read it once, yet I do not at all times feel that I have the attention of all Senators. I say that this provision sends us into the markets of the world to compete with anyone without charge or price on their part, because it says that whatever privileges are given to the United States under this bill or treaty, or whatever you call it, the same shall be extended to any other country. That is the most-favored-nation clause by legislation instead of by treaty. The language of it is unequivocal. Canada wanted to keep her net out for the whole sea and confine us to some little bay of the St. Lawrence River, and she says that the advantages hereby granted to the United States, after referring to them by schedule, shall extend to any and every other foreign power which may be entitled thereto under the provisions of any treaty or convention of His Majesty. That gives England the power to open wider the doors of free trade in Canada. That is the market we are to sell in, and the market they are to sell in is one that is guarded by protective tariff duties against all the world. We give them a protected market to sell in and they give us a world-wide competitive market. We will sell our meats in Canada, if we sell them, in competition with the colonial Provinces of England, Australia, or any other Province that she has to-day, or may have; and she is not confined to existing conditions that she may make.

What kind of a business proposition is that? Is there a business man in the world who would enter into such a proposition as that? His neighbor says: "You may graze your cows in my pasture for a consideration," and he thinks he is going to have pasture for his cows. He goes and finds cows from Germany, France, Holland, and every other nation there grazing. He says, "Where are my cows going to graze?" They will take their chance, he is told, in this field. You make a contract, and in lieu of this privilege which you supposed you had, you say they may graze here, and they come over and find no German, or French, or European, or Asiatic cattle sharing the pasture with them.

That is this much lauded and boasted reciprocity which is disguised here under the name of a bill, or the bill is disguised under reciprocity, it matters not which. You are proposing to attach the Root amendment, which simply makes it more of a reciprocal trade agreement, takes it out of the tariff schedule and makes it an ordinary reciprocal arrangement. You let my paper in and I will let yours in.

I shall have to vote against the amendment. As I said, if I were to be actuated by the spirit of destruction I would vote for it in order to make it more obnoxious, but I think probably that the responsibility for this legislation will find a resting place. It will be in the plain open view of the American people, and they will know just where to go out with their scalping knife and tomahawk.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I simply want to put into the RECORD a few thoughts that have come to me from a source so authoritative that I have no hesitation whatever in quoting them. I desire the Senate to know that we have about $22,000,000 invested in paper making in the State I have the honor in part to represent, and the thriving city of Kalamazoo alone has nearly $10,000,000 invested in paper making.

Michigan has a growing and ample supply of suitable wood from which to continue the successful operation of its present equipment of modern and extensive paper mills, as well as many others which may be added. Any of the hardwoods as well as all of the varieties of the soft woods grown in our State are well suited for the manufacture of book papers and the other grades of paper made in the Michigan mills.

I think I am clearly justified in stating that the production of paper might be increased fivefold, and if the mixed woods of our forests were used to manufacture the soda pulp with which to exclusively provide for the needs of all our paper mills ample wood for the purpose could be secured at a cost of not above $5 per cord delivered at the mill. This, too, without any limitation as to time. In this estimate I am not including the virgin forests of the northwestern portions of the upper peninsula. As much more could be said of that portion of our State.

While at present Michigan is not a large producer of paper made from mechanical pulp, chiefly because of lack of developed water power with which to grind the wood, the increase in the manufacture of this lower grade—news print—might be readily justified, so far as the local supply of pulp wood is involved.

We have the possible water power with which to develop that special line of paper making.

The Newspaper Publishers' Association sets forth as the chief reason for its demand for the free entry of Canadian paper the scarcity of pulp wood in the United States. Let me cite briefly some facts as to the pulp-wood supply at present standing in our Nation and the present consumption for paper manufacture. Maine has 40,000,000,000 feet, or 80,000,000 cords, of standing spruce. The annual growth of this is from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 cords.

The total United States consumption of spruce for newsprint paper is about 1,500,000 cords annually—less than half of the growth in Maine alone.

The total stand of spruce stumpage in the United States of America is not less than 150,000,000,000 feet. The growth annually in our spruce is about 5,000,000,000 to 6,000,000,000 feet, or 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 cords. The entire consumption for all grades of paper made from wood in our Nation is less than one-half of this growth.

This puts paper making exclusively on a spruce-wood basis, while the truth is two-thirds of all of the paper we make can be and ought to be made from other more easily accessible, very much cheaper, and quite as desirable woods.

New York, New Hampshire, Vermont, Montana, Colorado, and notably Washington and Oregon have large spruce forests, and, accessible to tidewater, in that treasury of natural wealth, Alaska, there is such a growing supply of choice spruce as to deter me from submitting an estimate of its extent.

If any one of six States of the South, awakened from the dreams of free tradeism, should take up the manufacture of paper, their growth of timber would be ample to supply all the wood paper used in the United States.

Added to the forest wealth of the States of the South they have the chemicals and clays and coal to complete the formula for paper making.

The paper-mill industry in the State of Michigan is yet in its infancy; forests and men and money are ready to contribute abundantly as the demand for paper increases, but this Canadian agreement is a menace, a serious menace, to even the successful continuation of the mills now established.

Mr. President, I am not going to supplement that statement, which I regard as very important. It comes from a man very familiar with this industry. It shows the possibilities upon our own soil. It renders our crossing over into a foreign State absolutely unnecessary. There is not a single man who will be engaged in making paper in Canada who will employ the American carpenter or bricklayer or mechanic or the farmer of our own country. It is perfectly idle for us to contribute in any way toward the transfer across the boundary of an industry so important to our people.

But, Mr. President, if the product of Canada is to come in here free, then I at least desire to have the product of our own mills go into Canada free. It may be that the time will come when the utilization of the tremendous water power of the St. Marys River and other water power on the Canadian border may put us in a position where we may contest, upon equal terms, with the manufacturers of paper in Canada. For that reason, not because I believe in the merits of this bill, which I condemn from the first word to the last as harmful to the people of this country and calculated to imperil our now friendly relations with the world. But if the products of Canadian labor in the paper mills of that empire are to come here free, I should like to have American labor in our own mills given the opportunity to contest with them upon equal terms upon their own soil.

Over $20,000,000 is now invested in paper making in the State of Michigan alone, and are you to catch this American industry by the throat and hold it until Canadians shall take possession of this market and weaken or destroy this important domestic industry employing thousands of our own citizens? I protest against it——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not only do some of us believe, Mr. President, that this bill, if it becomes a law, will practically transfer the manufacture of paper from this country to Canada, but it is well for us not to lose sight of the fact that there are about 70 concerns in the United States manufacturing paper-making machinery. They have a capital variously estimated at from ten to twenty million dollars invested in that enterprise. If the manufacture of paper goes to Canada, that great invested capital will necessarily be greatly injured if not entirely destroyed. So we alone have a loss that we can not compute by the transfer of the manufacture of paper across the border.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire entirely. He supplements what I have said with reference to the unwisdom of permitting manufactured paper to come into this country free.

Mr. President, I desire to put into the RECORD the names of various paper manufacturing institutions in the State of Michigan, with the capital invested by each. I ask unanimous consent that this statement may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, with a letter from Mr. N. H. Stewart, of Kalamazoo, Mich., who prepared this report and has summarized most apt strong objections to the passage of this pact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, consent will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

KALAMAZOO, MICH., May 1, 1911.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: For your information and the information of other Senators, I hand you herewith information embracing the number of paper mills in the State of Michigan, the amount of capital, the number of men employed, and location of same; and, in the names of all the workingmen—the stockholders—which includes men, women, and orphan children, I protest against the ratification of the agreement between the United States and Canada, which has for its purpose unrestricted competition in this line of manufacture. In Kalamazoo alone we are considered the largest manufacturers of paper in the world, and the existence of our industry is seriously threatened by the passage of the legislation now pending before the Senate. We hope and pray that those in charge of this measure may come to view the disastrous results which are sure to follow in the same light as we see it. We sincerely hope that we may continue to enjoy the same uniform treatment from the Government of the United States as is extended to other lines of American enterprise and employment.

Yours, very truly, N. H. STEWART.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has stated the magnitude of this interest in his State. I want to call attention to what this means to the little State I in part represent.

Two years ago, on the 19th day of June, 1909, I discussed this question at considerable length, which I am not going to do on this bill. I then called attention to the fact that New Hampshire had 28 paper mills, the estimated capital being $16,000,000; the number of wage earners, not including operations in the woods, 4,000; that the wages paid annually were $2,000,000; the value of products about $10,000,000; that the yearly capacity of the mills was—of paper, 200,000 tons; of ground wood, 200,000 tons; of sulphite, 150,000 tons, having 40,000 horsepower; and that the timberlands owned by the paper makers in the State aggregated 700,000 acres. And I observed, Mr. President, which is a fact, that the timberlands could not be conserved unless the industry is on a profitable basis. New Hampshire ranks seventh in capital and output among the States manufacturing paper.

Mr. President, I wanted to reproduce these figures in this debate to show that some of us, at least, stand for the industries of our own States, being unwilling that under what we conceive to be a foolish notion that we have got to do something for Canada, so as to be on good relations with Canada, that will be destructive to interests that we, as representatives of those States, are bound to preserve if we can.

It is said, Mr. President, that this amendment, about which there is a great difference of opinion, is not to prevail, and I do not know whether it is or not. I regretted that the author of the amendment, the advocate of it, should have conceded that at the start. It is not a very good way to pass an amendment or a bill. For myself, I believe that the amendment is a proper one, and I hope it will be incorporated in the bill; but whether it is or not, whether it wins or loses, I look upon it as my duty, as a believer in the doctrine of protection, which the Republican Party has held to so tenaciously all through its history, believing firmly that this legislation is all wrong, one sided, and unjust to our own people, to vote against the bill; and I shall take great pleasure in voting against it when it comes to its final passage. Just here, Mr. President, I will say that I do not care how soon that is to be. If it is, as I said the other day, ordained that the protective policy is to go down under a sentiment that has grown up in this country of late years, if it is ordained that this pact with our neighbor on the north shall become an accomplished fact, then I see no reason why we should very long delay the evil day.

I hope, Mr. President, that as the debate progresses we may gain converts, but I have very little expectation, from what I know, that we are going to gain votes enough to defeat this measure. As I have before said, that being the fact, I do not see any special gain in remaining here during the coming months of the summer discussing this question, which already has been so abundantly discussed. Let us in the near future vote on this bill, and on all the other bills that are before the Senate, and, for good or for bad accept the will of the majority, adjourn this Congress, and go to our homes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, just a word in reference to the pending amendment. Two years ago, when we were considering the paper schedule in the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, I voted against an amendment which proposed to reduce the tariff on print paper, as I remember, to $2 per ton, because the evidence seemed to indicate that that amount did not cover the difference in the cost of production in the two countries. It might seem that, in order to be consistent here now, my vote should be in favor of the Root amendment; but as I intend to vote against that amendment I feel that a word of explanation is proper.

I shall vote against the amendment because it is put upon the ground that it is necessary in order to restore this bill to a fair compliance with the agreement entered into between the representatives of Canada and the United States, and on the ground that we ought not to change that agreement in the slighest particular by crossing a "t" or dotting an "i." I do not believe that. I think we ought to amend it in a great many particulars, and I am not in favor of standing by the proposition that this amendment should be adopted because we are opposed to changing the original agreement.

It seems that in the bill as it passed the other House and as it is before the Senate the original agreement has been changed by section 2, and materially changed—changed because those interested in free newspaper print paper wanted it changed and did not hesitate to entirely set the agreement aside in order to change it; but when we propose some change that will in a small way compensate the farmer, whose products are being placed on the free list, we are told "No; this agreement must not be changed, not by the crossing of a 't,' nor the dotting of an 'i.'" Because I am not willing to support any such position as that, and because this proposed amendment is offered on the theory that it is going back to the agreement to preserve it sacredly as it was made, and by voting for it I am in a measure committing myself to the proposition that we shall not change it, I am going to vote against the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I merely wish a minute before the vote is taken upon the pending amendment. I am in receipt of a telegram from New York, signed by the American Paper & Pulp Association, which I shall read to the Senate. It is as follows:

NEW YORK, June 26, 1911.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Record of Senate debates shows opposition to Root amendment based on entirely wrong assumptions. First, International Paper Co. does not control paper prices or production. Produce less than 10 per cent of all paper and only about 30 per cent of news print. Could not control situation if it tried to. Great injustice to destroy whole industry, for purpose of injuring International Co. Second, Tariff Board report shows over $5 excess cost producing print paper United States over Canada, due to cost of wood. Access to Canadian wood in no measure offsets this disadvantage, because transportation charges on Canadian wood to our mills amount to $5 per ton of paper, while transportation charges to our markets on finished products practically equal from United States and Canada mills. Third, House amendment of original agreement gives incentive to provincial governments to remove pulp-wood restrictions only for benefit of Canadian mills and to continue against exporting pulp wood. There are many ways of accomplishing this result, rendering House provision absolutely ineffective. Root amendment, giving all paper or none free entry, will be much greater inducement to remove all pulp-wood restrictions. Fourth, we again affirm absolutely free competition exists, prices are reasonable, and denounce publishers' statements of combination and extortion as absolutely false.

AMERICAN PAPER & PULP ASSOCIATION.

Mr. President, as I stated, I have just received the telegram. The amendment is about to be voted upon, and I simply wished to read it to the Senate.

Mr. STONE. May I ask the Senator from whom the telegram which he has just read came?

Mr. SMOOT. In my opening statement I stated that the telegram was signed by the American Paper & Pulp Association.

Mr. STONE. It would appear to have come from the International Paper Co.

Mr. SMOOT. I beg pardon of the Senator. I did not hear him.

Mr. STONE. I say it would appear to have been formulated by the International Paper Co.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I think the American Paper & Pulp Association would know about what the International Paper Co. manufactures. That is a matter of record. The Senator will also remember that in the hearings the amount of paper made by that company is stated.

Mr. STONE. I remember that the Finance Committee called on Mr. Lyman, of the International Paper Co., to furnish the committee with information as to the number of mills it had acquired, the number it owned, the number it was operating, the number it had dismantled or discontinued, the amount of its output, and other things of like kind. A similar request for the same information was made by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress, and the information was promised by Mr. Lyman. I am advised by the clerk of the Committee on Finance that Mr. Lyman has sent a communication to the Finance Committee declining to furnish that information. I was wondering whether, instead of furnishing the information to the committee which was investigating the subject matter, he had concluded to send it to the Senate in the form in which the Senator from Utah has presented it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I remember the circumstance referred to by the Senator from Missouri, it was this: The chairman of the committee wrote a letter to Mr. Lyman, the secretary of the International Paper Co., for certain information as to the cost of production, the number of mills which the company owns, where located, what the power costs, and so forth, including details of the minutest kind. Mr. Lyman answered that telegraphic request by a long letter, and I believe that letter has been published.

Mr. STONE. It has been.

Mr. SMOOT. And it is before the Senate. It is dated June 6, 1911.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Lyman declined to furnish the information.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Lyman also gives the reason why he declines to furnish the information. I suppose the Senator has read that letter.

Mr. STONE. I have read it.

Mr. SMOOT. Among other things, he says the mills of the International Paper Co. constitute one property, and we are averse to giving Mr. Norris full opportunity to distort facts, magnify trivialities, and so forth, which, of course, Mr. Lyman thinks has been done in the past. Whether it has been or not is for every Senator to judge after reading the testimony. I received the telegram a few moments ago, and I thought it proper to read it to the Senate, and therefore did so.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN APPROPRIATION ACTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts, approved March 4, 1911, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. FOSTER the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. NELSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, upon what amendment is the call made for the yeas and nays?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment to the so-called reciprocity bill. Thirteen Senators have seconded the request for the yeas and nays——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to be heard upon that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator shall be heard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would it not be proper, Mr. President, to announce whether the demand for the yeas and nays was seconded?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I certainly understood, and I think others did, that we were voting on the question whether the request of the House for a conference on a certain measure should be complied with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question again, then.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not understand the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question had been put on the measure coming over from the House, and the Chair announced the appointment of the conferees; but the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desires to be heard now, and the Chair will wait until after the Senator has been heard before again putting the question on the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon the amendment to the President's so-called reciprocity pact, proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], I wish to submit some observations for the consideration of the Senate.

First, as to the question of policy: What principle should govern in legislation concerning the supply of pulp wood? What principle should govern in legislation concerning the general subject of timber supply?

I aver that, second only to our need for food, comes our need for timber. Without a sustained supply of timber adequate for its needs this Nation can not maintain its prosperity. With its forests stripped bare and no longer productive this country must face a condition which, in the last analysis, would endanger its very existence.

The question of national timber supply is not one for the people of this country alone. It is really a world question. No one nation can solve it. It would be quite as futile for the United States alone to attempt the solution of this great world problem of maintaining a permanent supply of timber as for any one State of the Union to attempt such a solution on its own part, without regard to the country as a whole. As in the United States it is a national, not a State, problem, so in the case of the great powers it is a world, not a national, problem.

A review of the essential facts regarding the consumption and production of timber in other countries, therefore, is important to a consideration of the general subject of forest conservation, and hence to a consideration of this amendment now before the Senate relating to the supply of pulp wood. I will present to the Senate a very brief, but, I think, valuable, survey of the world's supply of timber.

EUROPE.

Europe both imports and exports more than 1,000,000,000 cubic feet of wood yearly. The imports, however, exceed the exports by about 10 per cent. Since this excess of imports is made up chiefly by supplies from Canada and the United States, it has a very pronounced bearing upon the question now before the Senate.

A brief summary of European conditions is as follows:

First. The leading import countries—that is, Great Britain, Germany, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and so forth—are rapidly increasing the amount of their imports, and this increase is certain to continue.

Second. Russia, Finland, and Sweden only of the export countries have increased their exports to great extent without encroaching on their timber capital.

Third. Norway and Austria-Hungary are already overcutting their forests and will in all probability have to reduce their exports in the future.

In view of these facts and considering the rising prices of wood throughout the world, it is certain that any increase of wood exports from Russia, Finland, and Sweden will be eagerly competed for by Great Britain, France, and Germany, and also that there will be no surplus of any consequence for the United States, which is handicapped by its greater distance from the principal source of supply.

Now, Mr. President, without taking the time of the Senate to go into the details of the world's supply, I request permission to have this summary printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Without objection, the request is granted.

AFRICA.

Both North and South Africa are importers of timber, and these imports will increase with the increased development of the country. The forests of central Africa are little known, but it is certain that their area is not so great as was once commonly supposed. The chief species of commercial value in that section are hardwoods, which are expensive, and which have little bearing on the question of the supply of common timber for use in the United States.

ASIA.

India, the chief forest country of Asia, exports teak and some other valuable woods, but it is necessary for it to import structural timber. China is a wood-importing country, and its requirements will undoubtedly take the most of any surplus that may come from eastern Siberia and Manchuria. If only structural timber is considered, Japan is a wood-importing country; but if all woods are considered, it is a wood-exporting country. Japan can supply its own needs when all the forests become accessible, but will probably not be able to export any saw-log timber.

AUSTRALIA.

Australia is a wood-importing country at present, and it is not likely that there will ever be much surplus timber for export. With the exception of comparatively small quantities of hardwoods, the forests of Hawaii can never become important in the timber trade of the world. The Philippines at present import much more timber than is exported. Eventually the native forests should supply the principal demands of the home market with a considerable excess for exportation to near-by countries, such as China. The total stand of commercial timber in the Philippines, however, is about enough to supply the total demand of the United States for two years; hence the islands will never become an important factor in supplying our needs for wood.

TROPICAL AND SOUTH AMERICA.

Mexico, the West Indies, and Central America now import timber, not so much because they have none, but for the reason that their stands are at present inaccessible. It is probable that they will for some time continue to import the common structural timbers and will export valuable woods, such as mahogany and cedar.

For many years South America will continue to export hardwood, dyewood, etc., and to import lumber and construction material. When the great forests of the Andes and the interior are opened up, then they will supply the home market. Wood consumption will have so increased in South America by that time, however, and logging and transportation will be so expensive because of the comparative inaccessibility of the forests that it is not reasonable to expect any considerable exportation of timber suitable for common uses in the United States.

NORTH AMERICA.

The total stand of timber in Alaska is probably no greater than twice the amount of lumber annually cut in the United States. The Alaskan industries require a considerable proportion of the output of the home forests, so little will remain for export to the United States.

Canada is the only country from which the United States is importing any considerable amount of timber. The total amount of standing timber in Canada, however, is estimated at no more than one-quarter of that in the United States. The Canadian forests are already being cut and burned at least as fast as they are growing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The above facts show a steady increase in the wood consumption and imports of nearly all the leading countries. The tendency is strongly toward a greater cutting of timber by the wood-exporting countries to make up the increasing deficit of the wood-importing countries. This policy, if continued, would lead to a universal shortage, with no surplus to draw upon. This condition will probably be prevented by better methods of forest management and a correspondingly increased timber production. But it is entirely clear from the statements of authorities on the subject, of which the most important is the National Conservation Commission, that the world as a whole has no vast untapped source of timber supply to draw upon. It is equally true, and that is the conclusion of the National Conservation Commission, that eventually the United States must grow the timber sufficient for her needs, or she must go without.

I know, Mr. President, the disposition in this practical age to brush aside all these forecasts and to consider only the needs of the hour. But I make my appeal to the Senate this afternoon from considerations of broader statesmanship than that. We must not deceive ourselves by the belief that once the products of Canadian forests come free into the United States the problem of a sustained timber supply in this country will be solved. At present we get about 900,000,000 feet of lumber and 900,000 cords of pulp wood from Canada each year, or 2 per cent of the lumber and 23 per cent of the pulp wood which we use. Canada has more spruce pulp wood than we have, but her standing saw timber is only about one-third of ours, or enough to supply our total demand at the present rate for about 10 years, and that is all. Whether we have timber to meet our needs continuously will depend upon how we handle our own forests, and not upon the temporary supplies obtainable from other countries. Sooner or later, Senators, we must meet this responsibility. It is before us now. It can not be ignored. And with the problem of the wise handling of our forests comes also the problem of their ownership and control.

But although Canada's supply of standing timber is far more limited than many persons suppose, among whom is the President of the United States, it is still sufficient to supplement importantly for up to half a century the yield of the rapidly dwindling forests on this side of the line.

The question immediately before us, is whether it is in the best permanent interest of the American people to utilize Canadian timber and pulp wood until their own forests have had time to grow again, or whether it is not. This question calls, first of all, for consideration of the extent of our forest resources, of their ownership, of the extent of their use, and of the extent of their misuse.

Our prodigality in the use of the forests can scarcely be told in words. We have exploited them as if we believed them to be inexhaustible. We have stimulated our national appetite for wood until it is far the largest in the world. Our consumption of wood per capita is 260 cubic feet; that of Germany is 37 cubic feet, and that of France, 25 cubic feet. Canada, which has 60 acres of forest per capita to our 6 acres, uses less than 200 cubic feet per capita. Our lavish use of the forest has made possible swift and huge development in home building, in industry, and in commerce, which otherwise could not have taken place. Not only our own country, but foreign countries as well have profited by our prodigality in the exploitation of our originally vast forest resources.

We all understand that, Mr. President. I was born in a timber State. From my childhood I have watched the development of that State. I myself know how generally it was felt, a quarter of a century ago, that the people owed a great deal to the lumbermen. They seemed to be the State builders. The truth is they were destroying one of the great natural sources of the State's wealth. They were gathering immediate harvests, great fortunes, for themselves. They were conducting their lumbering operations without the slightest regard to the future well-being of the Commonwealth. But prodigal as has been our use of the standing timber in the past, the chief reason for the present timber scarcity and for the far greater scarcity to come lies in our excessive waste of wood itself and of the forests which produce it.

For many years you could not ride through northern Wisconsin—and that State is typical of every pine-timber State—without traversing great blackened and charred areas, which were burned over again and again, season after season. Annually these fires swept through our forests, leaving in their wake enormous loss and ruin.

Since 1870 forest fires have each year destroyed an average of $50,000,000 worth of timber. Not less than 50,000,000 acres of forest are burned over yearly.

I come from a State that has reason to take account of this devastation that comes to us like a blight, year after year, from the forest fires. I live on a little farm 3 miles from the capital of Wisconsin. Almost every summer—particularly in seasons of drouth—the clouds of smoke from fires in northern Wisconsin, carried southward on the winds, are dense enough, even after traversing the entire length of that great State, to obscure my view of the capitol.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am much interested in the Senator's discussion of this important question. I want to say to the Senator that a few years ago New Hampshire was obscured one beautiful summer day. We were in comparative darkness, and upon investigation it was determined that it was caused by the smoke from burning forests in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no doubt of that, Mr. President, for the great smoke cloud that sweeps down from the northern portion of Wisconsin when the forests are burning spreads its black pall not only over my own State, but drifts across the lakes to the east, and to the west and away to the south beyond the borders of Illinois.

The young growth destroyed by fire is actually worth far more than even the merchantable timber burned. One-fourth of the standing timber is left in the woods or otherwise lost in logging. The loss in the mill is about one-third of the timber sawed. The loss in the mill product through careless seasoning and wasteful fitting for use is from one-seventh to one-fourth. An average of 320 feet of lumber is used for each thousand feet which stood in the forest.

We take from our forest each year, not counting the loss by fire, nearly three and one-half times their yearly growth. We take 40 cubic feet per acre for each 12 cubic feet grown.

We invite by overtaxation the continued misuse of our forests. We should plant, to protect farms from wind and to make denuded or treeless lands productive, an area larger than that of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia combined. But so far lands successfully planted with trees make a total area smaller than Rhode Island. And year by year, through careless cutting and fires, we lower the capacity of existing forests to produce their like again or totally destroy them. These statements are vouched for by the National Conservation Commission, and are based upon the best information available regarding the production, use, and misuse of our forests.

I see Senators about me who smile at this phase of my discussion. This is not unexpected. I presume that 40 years ago any voice that was lifted in protest against the great land grants made to railroads at that time provoked here and there over the Senate Chamber or in the House of Representatives smiles of wearied tolerance. And yet to-day there is no man on this floor, or on the floor of the House, who does not regret that we were so lavish with the public land in our eagerness to have railroad lines builded across this western country. Mr. President, when we have passed away, Senators who will then have the places we now occupy will wonder why we did not interpose with legislation to prevent the waste and the devastation of our natural resources—particularly of our forests.

The statements which I am presenting to the Senate this afternoon are supported by the highest authority based on expert investigation that is wholly disinterested. Of course, it is likely to be called by practical men—men who want to convert our natural resources into fortunes for themselves—chimerical and visionary, just, as I presume, the protests of some Senators and some Representatives of 40 years ago against the extravagant grants made to railroads out of the public domain were ridiculed as carpings of reform.

What I am offering to the consideration of the Senate will some day be regarded as worth while. These statements are conservative statements, compiled from adequate data by trained, conservative men, who have no bias, no partisan feelings, no selfish reasons to pervert the facts. They must be accepted as authoritative and as a basis for legislative action. They will be in some other generation, if not in this.

The inevitable conclusion from all available facts is that we are using our forests up very rapidly. We have about 40 years' supply of mature timber left. After it is gone we will inevitably suffer for timber to meet our needs until our forests have had time to grow again. Whether we escape actual timber famine depends directly upon how promptly and efficiently we apply to the management of our remaining forests the principles of practical forestry.

I do not think we are dependent on any reciprocal agreement—above all, not upon the unjust, one-sided, misnamed pact that we are now called upon to sanction with supine surrender of our prerogatives as legislators—to secure the necessary reenforcements to our timber reserves. Believing this, I purpose to offer, as a part of the tariff revision which will be submitted to the Senate before the fate of this bill is decided, amendments that will deal with this same question. I purpose to place before the Senate this very question of free print paper and pulp wood as a part of a plan of tariff revision. Then, if the Canadian Parliament shall reject—and no man knows whether it will accept or reject—this proposed agreement, we should still secure through the tariff provisions of the bill some measure of relief independent of the action of the Canadian Parliament on the so-called reciprocity provision.

Mr. President, the vital question, and one which must be answered in considering our relations with Canada in the interchange of forest products, is whether we may reasonably expect so prompt and thorough an application of forestry to the bulk of our forest lands in the United States that they will produce in time a supply sufficient for reasonable needs. The men upon whom we should depend for the care of our forests are the lumbermen, in whose hands are three-fourths of our forest area and four-fifths of all standing timber in the United States.

Can we depend upon the lumbermen to log their holdings conservatively, to plant up denuded lands, to protect their forests from fire, and to put these measures into effect promptly, skillfully, and successfully? We can not. We need look only to the experience of Wisconsin to convince ourselves that we can not hope for any such foresightedness and patriotism.

The lumbermen of Wisconsin went out to gather their fortunes quickly. They thought not of the future. What value would attach to the land after it was stripped of the trees was a matter they did not even consider. I know great lumbering companies in Wisconsin that were ready at any time to give to the State at a nominal price their cut-over lands. What they wanted was the magnificent white pine that covered each quarter section, bought often at the low figure of $1.25 per acre. From each of these they gathered in sometimes as much as $10,000. What cared they for the future of that quarter section?

Mr. President, it is the experience of my own State that we can not depend upon the lumbermen for the future supply of timber. After they had swept the State clean they left behind them the débris and the refuse and slashings of the timber, which make forest fires an annual visitation. They prepared the way for the destruction of any further growth of timber.

I say, and I say it with keen regret, from our experience in Wisconsin, we can not safely count upon the American lumbermen in general for any service in the direction of the conservation of our forest supply for the future. For more than a decade the United States Forest Service has pursued a vigorous campaign of education in forestry. It has offered the help of its trained men in the practical solution of forest problems confronting the lumbermen. It has set to all private forest owners a splendid and a most instructive example in its efficient management and protection of the great national forests.

To-day these forests stand as proof to the whole world of the enormous public benefits to be had from the conservation by use of forest lands which are the property of the Nation. But have American lumbermen in general profited by the Nation's example and by the opportunities for help and advice afforded them by the Government? I say, with deep regret, that they have not. To-day not more than 1 per cent of private forest lands in the United States are conservatively logged or adequately protected from fire or handled in any important respect with a view to the production of a second crop. I realize that the general lack of State cooperation in fire control and the generally excessive rates of taxation of forest lands have in some measure retarded the practice of forestry by individual timber-land owners. But these unfavorable influences fall far short of justifying the nearly complete failure of American lumbermen to reduce their present profits far enough to provide for a second crop of timber for the American people.

Had American lumbermen done their duty, it would have been unnecessary and it would have been inadvisable to open America to free rough lumber and wood pulp from Canada. It would have been unnecessary, since had our forests been rightly managed they would already be producing a sufficient supply for all our needs. It would have been inadvisable, because the influx of the Canadian supply will tend to still less care of our own forests through the assumption that now Canada's sources of supply are open to us we may safely disregard the conservation of our own. We are forced, therefore, to a step which would never have been necessary and which has been made necessary directly through the failure of American lumbermen to practice forestry.

Free trade with Canada in forest products would replenish our own timber supply for a period sufficient to enable our own forests to produce again. For that reason I believe that free trade in these products is in the best permanent interest of the American people. But the advantage gained through these reciprocal relations can be totally destroyed if they are permitted to further retard the practice of forestry in America. Many American lumbermen, if given their own way, will find in reciprocity an excuse for continued wasteful exploitation of forests in their hands. That danger, which has already been vigorously pointed out by American foresters, is one which we can not safely disregard. I believe its solution lies not merely in the education of American lumbermen to the business advantages of practical forestry, but in legislation by the States and, if necessary, by the Nation, which will provide that American lumbermen conserve the great resource which they hold in trust, whether it fits in with their individual plans to do so or whether it does not.

The spectacle of a great nation supinely awaiting the complete destruction of her forests through the greed of a small group of corporations and individuals into whose hands they have fallen is little less than a national disgrace. I take the position that the private ownership of a great public resource is a public trust. I hold that American lumbermen should be given whatever help they are entitled to in applying conservative methods through the reduction of excessive rates of taxation and of excessive railroad rates for the transportation of timber. But I hold further that there must also come, and come soon, an honest and a united effort on the part of American lumbermen in general to conserve the forests, upon whose productivity the industrial prosperity of this Nation in large part depends. That which lumbermen should do and will not do in the public interest they should be made to do through legislation. It is in the best interest of the lumbermen themselves that they should give heed to the growing volume of public sentiment for forest conservation, aroused by the public-spirited efforts and the teachings of men like Gifford Pinchot, before this sentiment finds expression in legislation which will be none the less severe because the need for it is created by the selfishness and the shortsightedness of the lumbermen themselves.

In the life of this Nation free lumber and pulp wood from Canada, so far as a sustained supply of timber is concerned, is but a crust to a hungry man. It will stay the pangs of hunger for a brief period, but it leaves the larger problem of square meals in the more distant future entirely unsolved.

In the last analysis, the permanence of our wood supply will depend upon the methods employed by American lumbermen, who own nearly all the timber in the United States. So far these lumbermen, with a few notable exceptions, have lent a deaf ear to public sentiment for forest conservation, and their most vigorous efforts seem to have been given not to the formation of policies and plans by which they might conserve the forests upon their holdings, but to the concentration of a dominant control of standing timber, steadily tending toward a central control of the lumber industry.

We would do well to remember that before we are assured a sustained supply of timber we will have this central control to deal with along these two main lines: It must not be permitted to succeed in that artificial inflation of the prices of lumber, which is its paramount object; and it must be led, and if necessary it must be forced, so to handle forest lands in private hands that their production of timber will be continuous. If reciprocity in forest products is permitted to interfere or to retard these measures, it will have done more harm than good.

Mr. President, when the question of the duties upon print paper and pulp wood was before the Senate two years ago, when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was under consideration, the disinterested testimony then available upon the cost of production of print paper in this country and Canada appeared to establish a production cost of $1.80 per ton lower in the Canadian mills than in our mills. This testimony was obtained by the Mann committee of the House of Representatives and by the investigations conducted under the direction of the Commissioner of Labor. The facts reported by the Mann committee and by the Bureau of Labor were in substantial agreement, although, as I now remember, the table of figures presented by the Mann committee did not work out the ultimate averages which would show a difference in the labor cost in the production of paper in this country and Canada.

I found it necessary at the time not only to supplement the work of the Mann committee and the work of the Bureau of Labor, but to take both the work of the Mann committee and Bureau of Labor and, upon those figures, to complete and harmonize the work of the two. I remember very distinctly that as a result of that calculation, worked out with the aid of experts, a difference in the cost of each ton of print paper was found to be $1.80 per ton.

It was also established upon facts presented two years ago that many of the print-paper mills in the United States had exhausted the supply of pulp wood in territory contiguous to such mills, and an investigation which I caused to be made disclosed that the average transportation charge for the raw material to produce a ton of paper would require a duty of $5 per ton in addition to the difference in the labor cost. I mean that a number of mills in my own State, for instance, had exhausted the supply of raw material in their immediate neighborhood, so that while the difference in producing a ton of paper in those mills and in the Canadian mills, outside of the transportation cost of the raw material, was $1.80, and fully covered by $2 a ton, still the transportation cost on the raw material necessary to make a ton of print paper amounted substantially to $5, because the local fields of supply of the raw material had been exhausted and the nearest supply was so far away that the transportation charge amounted to the large sum of $5.

Based upon the figures of the Mann committee and the Bureau of Labor the difference in the manufacturing cost per ton of print paper as between this country and Canada it appeared at that time would be covered by a duty of $2 per ton. The great bulk of the print-paper mills in the United States, like those of Canada, are located in close proximity to the supply of raw material required in its manufacture. But there are print-paper mills in the United States, such, for example, as those located in Wisconsin, so remote from the timber required for the manufacture of such paper, that the freight upon the pulp wood places such mills at an enormous disadvantage. Adding the average transportation charge on raw material to the cost of manufacture would require as to such mills a duty of at least $7 per ton to measure the difference in the cost of production in competition with Canadian mills. It would be monstrous to contend for the application of the protective principle to offset transportation charges on raw material, amounting to at least two and one-half times the difference in the actual cost of manufacture. It would, of course, be possible but grotesquely absurd to place protective duties on tropical fruits high enough to insure hothouse production in North Dakota. No sound business principle would warrant establishment of an industry so far from the source of supply that the transportation rate on the raw material would constitute from one-fifth to one-sixth of the total cost of the finished product. No justification can be found for taxing the consumers of such finished product to pay for the artificial maintenance of industries so located.

Believing that $2 was necessary to measure the legitimate difference in the cost of production between this country and Canada I voted for such duty two years ago. Believing, furthermore, that it would be fair to the capital invested in print-paper mills which had exhausted the supply of raw material in contiguous territory, and were therefore compelled to pay transportation charges for hauling their raw material over longer and longer distances, to be still further protected temporarily while changing from the manufacture of print paper to such other forms of paper manufacture as would not be subjected to the excessive transportation charges on raw material, I offered an amendment providing that the proposed rate of $4 per ton on print paper be continued for the limited period of two years. The amendment which I offered provided that the rate be reduced to $2 per ton on and after the two-year period. This amendment was not adopted, but in conference the duty was fixed at $3.75 as a permanent duty. Against this as a permanent rate I cast my vote on the final passage of the bill.

Although the rate of $2 per ton seemed to me two years ago, upon such facts as were then before the Senate, to be destructive of the industries in Wisconsin, I could not bring myself to vote for a higher rate than that as a permanent rate. I was willing to vote for a $4 rate, provided it were limited to one year or two years, in which time the machinery used in print paper might be changed to manufacture other forms of paper made from raw material nearer at hand; but I could not vote, Mr. President, for a permanent duty of $3.75 or $4 per ton on print paper at that time.

One month ago the report of the Tariff Board relative to pulp and news-print paper was submitted to Congress. It is an interesting document; interesting because of the new disclosures which it makes concerning the manufacture of print paper in the United States and Canada; interesting because it both illuminates and obscures, upon a first reading, important facts regarding this industry. It contains tables that one could almost believe were constructed to confuse, except for the fact that a close study of the text enables the investigator, with much labor, ultimately to find the truth.

It is, however, an important document, and is not only the latest, but altogether the best contribution which has been made to the subject of production cost of print paper in the United States and Canada.

Mr. President, I am going to tax the patience of the Senate for a few minutes to present some facts which any Senator who will take the time can uncover for himself, but I know how busy Senators are, and I am going to assume that not every Senator here has worked out in detail this report upon print paper. It is most illuminating, and, Mr. President, it occurs to me to say that the revelations which this report makes as to the cost of manufacturing paper may throw a light into many obscure places regarding all manufacturing industries, and may greatly aid us in seeking to do justice at this session between the manufacturers, on the one hand, and the consumers, the great public, on the other hand.

The tables given by the report of the Tariff Board on the paper industries of the United States and Canada show on their face a difference in favor of Canada amounting to nearly $5 per ton on print paper. Taking those tables as the guide—and I submit that that is where almost any man will turn to get his deductions of the investigations of any bureau or any board—taking those tables as his guide, he would be driven to the conclusion that we ought to have at least a five-dollar duty to offset the difference in the cost of production from the stump to the finished product of print paper between this country and Canada. The representatives of the paper industry who appeared before the Committee on Finance made the most of the averages as shown by these tables.

I ask Senators to follow me while I analyze this report. I want to say at the outset that it shows we can manufacture print paper on a common level with the people on the other side of the Canadian border. I will demonstrate that fact by the report of the Tariff Board, upon which the administration relies to sustain this so-called reciprocity pact; and while I am arguing, for the time being, for free print paper and pulp wood, and purpose later to offer that as a tariff amendment, I do not want to be understood as being willing to secure that for the consumers of print paper at the expense of the great agricultural industry of this country. That is not just; it is not right. I do not care whether or not it is popular; I do not care whether or not it gives a man the support of all the newspaper press of the country; it will not have my support. It is not right; it is not just; and I will stand for no legislation that is not just to each and every class, whether it be the producer, the manufacturer, or the consumer. For myself, I will not sanction duties which go below that level which will be fairly protective, measured by the difference in the cost of labor and the cost of production between this and competing countries. I do not care how alluring the offer of such rates of duty may be to the people of this country. I will do all in my power to secure justice to the newspaper publishers, precisely as I will strive to secure justice for all the people who are the victims of overprotected industries. But whatever may be the consequences, I will not give my approval to this or any other scheme of legislation which sacrifices one class for the benefit of another.

While it is true, on the face of the figures, that the average cost of production of a ton of paper in the United States is more than $5 in excess of the average cost in Canada, I am not prepared to subscribe to the doctrine that the people of the United States are to be taxed in order to furnish protection—to what? To the real, honest, legitimate difference in the cost of production? No; to the rankest kind of inefficiency. You can have protection so high in any country, and under any protective-tariff system, as to deaden and destroy all incentive for efficient work. That is what we have had in this particular industry. We have been taught in the past that protection was justified as a measure for maintaining a higher standard of life, so important to the American workman and to society, and to that theory I still subscribe. If it can be shown that protection on news-print paper is needed in order to maintain the higher cost of labor in up-to-date mills, as I believed two years ago and as was demonstrated from the figures submitted by the Mann committee and by the Bureau of Labor, I would be the last man to vote for the removal of such duties.

The figures submitted two years ago, Mr. President, were the best available. The Mann committee had made its investigation, had visited two or three mills in Canada and several mills in this country. The Bureau of Labor had made its investigation, and those figures were the best figures available at that time. They showed a difference in labor cost of a little less than $2 per ton on print paper. They are not comparable to the investigation which has been made by the Tariff Board. They are outclassed in every respect. I am not citing a figure here on the statement of any prejudiced witness appearing before the Finance Committee; I am taking the figures sent us by the Tariff Board. It is an unbiased report, based upon expert investigation.

Now, what does it show? On page 39 of the report of the board there is a table which gives the average cost of production in the United States as $32.88 and in Canada as $27.53. That looks as if there were $5 difference in favor of Canada. It is misleading—I do not want to use any harsher term—and I want to suggest that back of that fact are many things that should put the Senate on its inquiry. That is the most I want to say now.

In that table are also given the lowest and the highest costs in the two countries. The lowest cost for the United States is shown to be $24.50, as against the lowest cost in Canada of $24.97; in other words, up-to-date mills in the United States, according to the report of the Tariff Board, based upon figures obtained direct from the books of the paper companies in the United States and Canada, show a lower cost of production in the United States as compared with Canada. What is more significant is the fact that the best American mills show a lower cost than the best Canadian mills, in spite of the higher cost of the ground wood pulp and the sulphite fiber, the two materials which go to make up news-print paper.

As will be seen from the table which I am quoting, the cost of ground wood pulp per ton of paper in the best mills in the United States is $8.26 as against $6.16 in Canada, a difference of $2.10 in favor of Canada. The cost of sulphite fiber per ton of paper in the best mills of the United States is $6.45 as compared with $5.28 in Canada, a difference of $1.17 per ton in favor of Canada. Thus, in spite of a difference of $3.27 in favor of the Canadian mills, the American mills come off with an advantage of 47 cents on the total cost of paper, making up for the high cost of materials by the lower cost of labor and other expenses. For, as will be seen from the sum total, the cost of manufacturing labor, per ton of paper in the best mills of the United States is $2.19 as against $2.72 in Canada, or a difference of 53 cents in favor of the United States; and the other costs, which include miscellaneous supplies, cost of machinery, and sundry expenses, are $4.63 in the United States as against $6.31 in Canada, a difference of $1.68 in favor of the United States.

The higher cost of ground and sulphite pulp is clearly due to the high cost of wood in this country. However, while it can not be disputed that the market price of wood in this country is higher than in Canada, it is well to clear our minds as to the cause of it. If it were due to the higher cost of labor engaged in cutting down the trees and hauling the logs, there would be no question as to the justification of a protective duty on wood. But this is not the case and can not be maintained by anyone. The difference is due solely to the higher stumpage value placed upon timber by American owners of woodlands. They are able to maintain that higher price partly because of the rapid extermination of our forests and still more because of the tremendous concentration of ownership in a few hands.

That is why I tax the patience of the Senate this afternoon to deal with this great question of timber supply. It might have seemed an abstract and unrelated subject, but I think Senators will now see its pertinence. The findings of the Bureau of Corporations, recently made public, show to what an appalling extent the ownership of our forests is becoming monopolized in this country.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do; certainly.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to the fact that the International Paper Co. itself in its telegram to the chairman of the Committee on Finance stated that it could compete with Canada in the production of paper, except for the difference in the cost of wood, as stated by the Senator?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am aware of that fact, and I thank the Senator for citing it right at this point. Are we justified, Mr. President—and I am coming now to a brief discussion of the subject raised by the interrogatory of the Senator from Nebraska—are we justified in imposing duties to protect the monopoly value placed upon stumpage by the Lumber Trust?

But even the higher cost of wood in this country is only fictitious in a large number of cases. Let me quote from the report of the Tariff Board. On page 43, discussing wood profit and stumpage in ground wood pulp, the report says:

Most of the manufacturers of pulp and paper—

Mind you, not some, but "most"— have protected their supply of raw material by more or less extensive investments in woodlands. As a rule the woodland account is credited with a "stumpage," or price per cord for the standing trees, in the price charged to the pulp mills.

I want to tell you, Senators, that it is pretty difficult to find out from these gentlemen what it costs them to make print paper. An investigation which those conducting it may feel to be thoroughgoing might lead to the conclusion that the paper manufacturers of the United States were actually losing money. I am not saying, Mr. President, that it did in this particular case.

And then, after beating back and forth over the ground, thoroughgoing investigators might find concealed here and there, between the print-paper factory and the timber on the stump, various holding companies—all of them subsidiaries of the paper company—selling their timber to the paper company and taking out immense profits, really the profits of the paper company, but on the books appearing to be the profits of somebody else, leaving the paper company in a manufacturing business that was showing on its face a loss.

Mr. President, a careful study of this report of the Tariff Board will repay any Senator. And I am inclined to believe it will be helpful to us in dealing with every single schedule of the tariff.

The Tariff Board has really very little power. It has to proceed on favor. But if a thoroughgoing investigation of the other tariff schedules is as illuminating as this, I believe we will be able to do a mighty service for the consumers of this country when we come to a thoroughgoing revision of the tariff.

I think the legislation which created the Tariff Board requires revision. The Tariff Board should be given real powers. It should have the power to go into a factory, summon witnesses, and to make them show their books, produce papers, and require them to testify on oath. It has to go in now appealingly and get by favor whatever is given to it. And in some industries, I think, it has already experienced great difficulty in getting the facts; it has found the doors barred and the books locked up. In this particular industry I think it had access to most of the facts. Possibly the device of these holding companies led these paper manufacturers to believe that they could invite the examination of the Tariff Board without serious risk. But they erred in their calculation.

Listen to this. I repeat what the Tariff Board reports:

Most of the manufacturers of pulp and papers have protected their supply of raw material by more or less extensive investments in woodlands. As a rule, the woodland account is credited with a "stumpage" or price per cord for the standing trees in the price charged to the pulp mills.

In other words, the paper company which owns the wood charges itself with a higher price for its own wood than it really costs. It is taking the money out of its right pocket and putting it in its left.

Stumpage—

Continues the report—

was charged into the cost of the wood that produced 572,561 out of the 725,254 tons of ground wood pulp covered by the report. In other words, 78.9 per cent of the ground wood pulp carried a stumpage profit. The lowest stumpage cost per ton of ground wood pulp was 51 cents on 6,003 tons of pulp; the highest stumpage cost was $2.48 on 38,499 tons; the average stumpage on the 572,561 tons which carried stumpage cost was $1.16 per ton.

In other words, here we have $1.16 included in the average cost of pulp and ultimately of paper into which pulp enters as raw material, in the United States, which has no business to be there. While the board clearly points it out in its comments, which I have just quoted, it does not attempt to eliminate it from the cost figure as it appears in the table, so that the latter taken by itself is misleading.

Why were the tables made up in that way? It is unfortunate, since most people are apt to take the figures as they appear in the final tables, having neither time nor patience to read the 130 pages of text. But this is not the only source which goes to swell the apparently higher cost of wood, therefore, of pulp and paper in this country. For not only do most of the paper companies charge themselves with a stumpage on the wood owned by themselves, but a great many of them also add a profit on the woodland operations as such.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. REED. In connection with the remarks the Senator has just made regarding the misleading character of the tables to which he is giving special reference, I desire to call his attention to the fact that certain tables regarding the cost of farm labor in the Dominion of Canada were so made up that when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] spoke of them, and showed that they did not contain a proper comparison with American wages, the figures were so misleading on their face that when the tables were examined by two other Senators they arrived at the same conclusion that the Senator from Missouri had, although an explanation was afterwards furnished. I simply cite it because it is cumulative along the line the Senator is discussing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not mean to be understood as imputing to the Tariff Board as a whole any construction of tables or any reports made to this body calculated to mislead. That is as far as I am going with my qualification.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Through the courtesy of the Senator, I desire to put into the RECORD a correction of the statement made by the Senator from Missouri.

It will be remembered that there was a question as to the wages paid in Canada and in the United States, and two Senators did agree with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that there was a mistake in the tables. But afterwards it was ascertained that there was not a mistake, and it was so stated to the Senate.

Mr. REED. I so stated. The tables as they were made up were so involved and so confusing as to deceive not only the Senator from Missouri, but two other Senators who examined them. After some days of labor they arrived at a solution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not only do most of the paper companies charge themselves with a stumpage on the wood owned by themselves, but a great many of them also add a profit on the woodland operations as such.

That is—

Says the report—

a profit on the cost of getting the wood from the forests to the mill. Of the 725,254 tons of ground wood pulp covered by the schedules secured, 494,689 tons, or 68.2 per cent, carried a profit cost on woodlands operation over and above stumpage. The highest profit so charged was $1.96 per ton of pulp. * * * The lowest was 12 cents. * * * The average profit cost carried by the entire 494,689 tons affected was $1.10 per ton.

Here, then, according to the statement of the Tariff Board, which went carefully into the subject, we have two fictitious charges included in the cost of paper, namely, $1.16 per ton of pulp for stumpage and $1.10 per ton of pulp for profit, or a total of $2.26 for each ton of pulp on the wood owned by the companies.

The mills resort to the same procedure in connection with their sulphite or chemical pulp. The board, in its report, says that—

> The average stumpage was $2.13 per ton of sulphite pulp, the range being from 99 cents as the lowest to $4.93 for the highest.

In addition to that there was the—> profit on woodland operations * * * the average of such profit * * * being $2.14 per ton.

Profit here—

Says the board, on page 44 of its report—

> must be understood to mean not only profit above stumpage on lands owned by the paper company or a subsidiary, but also the profits on a large amount of wood bought in the open market, either by the firm direct or more often by a subsidiary company, and resold to the parent company or to the pulp mill at a profit on the original purchase price.

And it is upon these fictitiously high costs that the paper companies have the hardihood to demand a protective duty.

As I have just shown, the figures of the board for the best mills in the United States and Canada show a lower labor cost per ton of product in the United States. This is not due to the fact that wages are lower in the United States than in Canada, although that is likewise true in individual instances, as shown in the report of the board, but is principally due to the greater efficiency of American management in the best mills and the fact that Canadians must obtain their machinery and a great part of their supplies from the United States and pay a duty when importing these into Canada.

Says the Tariff Board, on page 55 of its report, on the subject of efficiency of labor in Canada, and I invite the close attention of Senators to this:

> Canadian paper and pulp mills are equipped, as a rule, with the latest and most improved machines made by American manufacturers in the United States.
> The general managers and superintendents are for the most part Americans of wide experience. Those who are Canadians by birth are men who, like the Americans, have had long years of training in American paper and pulp mills. The skilled men, the machine tenders, and other hands who operate the paper machines are as a rule Americans brought from the United States for the purpose.
> And it is acknowledged on all sides that these men must be offered inducements in the shape of higher wages before they are willing to leave their country for Canada.

Why, then, it may be asked, does the average cost appear to be higher in the United States? The reason for that is that the industry being older in this country than in Canada, we are blessed with a large number of old, backward concerns, with antiquated machinery, resulting in higher costs.

Again let me quote the Tariff Board in support of my assertion: Table 18, on page 53 of the report of the Tariff Board, brings out this point very clearly by means of figures. The last line in the table shows that every mill in Canada was equipped with machines of American manufacture. That means not only that Canadian manufacturers must necessarily pay more for their machines on account of the freight and the Canadian duties on American machinery, but it also means that if a large proportion of American mills show a lower efficiency it is not due to any superior advantage possessed by the Canadians, but the failure of American manufacturers to equip themselves with American-made machines.

It would be an error to assume that the owners of these antiquated mills belong to a class of small but independent manufacturers in straitened financial circumstances.

The great International Paper Co., popularly known as the Paper Trust, controlling about a third of the total output of news-print paper in the country, has failed, according to statements that have never been denied by it, to equip most of the mills it took over at the time of consolidation with modern machinery, preferring to invest its capital in woodlands in this country and Canada which it will not be in a position to utilize for generations to come, and which it proceeded to acquire for purely speculative purposes. The Finance Committee gave that company an opportunity to disprove these statements, but, for reasons best known to itself, it declined to take into its confidence the very committee of which it demands a continuance of these favors. A tariff imposed under such conditions is a bounty to land speculators, and not a measure of protection to manufacturers.

Just what this up-to-date machinery means can be gleaned from Table 18, on page 53, to which I have just referred. Under the head "Capacity of machines" it shows that the average capacity of a machine in Canada is 31 tons of paper in 24 hours, while in the United States it is only 27.8 tons. How is that to be accounted for, in view of the fact that Canadian mills are dependent on the United States for their machinery as well as for the skilled labor required to operate them? The answer is found in the figures printed in the same line of the table from which I am quoting. Group A, comprising 56 per cent of the machines used by the American mills investigated by the board, shows an average output of 32.4 tons per machine, or higher than the Canadian average, while Group B, comprising 44 per cent of the American machines under investigation, shows an average of only 22.2 tons—almost 30 per cent poorer than the Canadian average and nearly 45 per cent below the average output of the five best mills in the United States, which was 40 tons per machine per day.

In other words, it is Group B, comprising the old junk outfit among which the Paper Trust holds the place of honor, that pulls down the figure of average efficiency of American mills and makes the average cost of production of paper in this country appear so much higher than in Canada. But the mills which prefer to invest their capital in up-to-date equipment rather than in greedily buying up all the visible forest supplies for speculative purposes and keeping competitors out of the business—these mills make a showing which leaves Canada far behind.

The same is true of all the other features which go to make for higher or lower efficiency. Thus in the matter of speed of machines, which determines the length of the roll of paper turned out by a machine per minute, we find the average for all mills in Canada investigated to be 480, while for the United States it is only 465.6 feet. But this lower American average is again caused by the low figure of 422.7 feet of Group B, which group shows an average of 499.3, and Group C as high as 537 feet. While 68.7 per cent of all the Canadian machines showed a speed of over 500 feet per minute, the per cent of American machines of an equal speed was only 38.1, and yet we make the machines for both countries. The explanation of this is very simple. Only the latest machines are made to work at a speed exceeding 500 feet. Those with a lower speed belong to an earlier period and should be discarded by every news-print paper mill which expects to do business without a subvention from Uncle Sam at the expense of consumers. The five best mills in the United States, comprising Group C, show that 90.9 per cent of their machines are of modern construction—that is to say, with a speed exceeding 500 feet per minute.

The same comments are suggested by the figures relating to width of rolls. The width of the roll, in conjunction with the speed of the machine, determines its output, for the wider the roll of paper which the machine can hold and the faster the revolution of the machine the greater its output of paper.

Mr. President, if Senators who believe in protection as I believe in protection, based upon principle, have followed me, they should see in this report on one of the great industries of this country a grave menace to the whole protective system. You can not maintain, sir, in this free country for any length of time any system that does injustice to the great majority of the people. I believe in a measure of protection that equalizes the difference between the labor cost in this and foreign competing countries, but when you make that protection such that you deaden all incentive for improvement, when you raise that tariff wall and exclude foreign competition so that men may rest on their oars because they control the market and can charge what they please, when, in this era of combination, competition between different manufacturers of the same product has been annulled and wiped out and destroyed, then, sir, you have defeated the purpose of protection, and you are undermining and destroying our industrial structure.

Mr. President, I will be for free trade the moment the conditions surrounding labor in this country and the competing countries of the world are in perfect equilibrium. I would rather see the revenues necessary for the maintenance of government derived by direct tax—the tax upon incomes and the internal-revenue taxes that lay the burden where it can most easily and most equitably be borne.

I stand, sir, and have always stood, for a tariff that will measure the difference, where there is a difference, between the cost of production in this and the competing countries.

My reason for that I can state in a word. The lives of the toilers are as completely built into the structure of this Government as are the lives of the men of great wealth. And, Mr. President, I am for a system that will make it possible for them and their children to have equality of opportunity with the man of greatest wealth in this country.

Labor, sir, lives at the level. Its condition is determined practically by the cost of that which it produces. I believe there is a difference in the conditions surrounding labor in this country and in the competing country. I believe the standard of living of labor here is higher and better than in competing countries. I believe that this difference should be measured by the tariff. If the products of the labor of the foreign competing countries come into this country at a lower level because their standards of living are at a lower level than in ours, then unless it is met by a tariff that measures the difference it will inevitably bring the labor of this country to that level or it will displace and take away the market from our labor.

There is no escape from that. It is recognized by a statute, to which Democrats and Republicans alike subscribed, providing that no manufacturer and no employer of labor shall be permitted to go abroad and employ labor at the price that labor earns abroad. If you will not permit the labor to be performed in this country at the foreign wage level—at the low price paid in other lands for the flesh and blood and bone and muscle that enter into production—then you have, let me say to Democrats here, no warrant or justification for bringing in freely the product of that labor.

So I am in favor of a duty that will recognize the difference between the conditions of foreign and American labor. It is in the homes of the laborers that we find the men who are to determine the destiny and the future of this country. I would not see their opportunities lessened or diminished or restricted so that they can not equip their children for the higher duties of citizenship which must be exercised by the people of a republic.

I am going to appeal later to Senators upon both sides of this Chamber to join with me and with other Senators upon both sides in adopting amendments as a part of this so-called reciprocity bill, this bill which immolates agriculture as a sacrifice for the benefit of packers and millers and the great publishing interests. There is no justification for legislation that confers its benefits on a small class, not entitled to such benefits, at the sacrifice of 33,000,000 of people of this country. And we can not justify our failure to improve the opportunity now afforded us to send up to the President of the United States a measure which, if he wants this reciprocity proposition, shall carry with it tariff reductions that will lift from the bended backs of the people of this country a large part of the burden they are now forced to carry in the form of flagrantly excessive duties which I shall show, before the debate is ended upon this bill, have increased enormously under the Aldrich tariff bill, in some instances more than 100 per cent.

Let me suggest to Senators to be in no haste. This matter is going to be discussed until the people know what a great burden they are carrying. They are going to understand that there is now an opportunity to get rid of at least a portion of it. You can not play politics here unknown to the people. They will understand if, for the sake of projecting the tariff question into the next presidential campaign, Senators are willing to let them struggle on under this excessive burden for one year or two, or—who knows, it may be ten years.

Mr. President, I would save the protective principle. I believe in it. I was a member of the committee that made the McKinley bill. At that time the duties were placed very high. It did not make so much difference then. Why? Because, while there was still competition between manufactures, the tariff was maintained on the theory I have already suggested—the original theory of the men who believed in protection from Alexander Hamilton down to McKinley. It was their belief that no matter what the difference, no matter how high the duties, if they measured more than the difference in the cost of production between this and competing countries, the free competition between domestic manufacturers would keep down prices and save the American people from the extortion of monopolies.

That is what Hamilton said. Nobody has shed any further light on that question since he reasoned it out. I do not believe a new argument has ever been made on the protective theory since Hamilton's time.

But, Mr. President, when the McKinley bill was enacted there was scarcely a trust or combination in this country. Only three or four can date back of that period—the Standard Oil, the Anthracite Coal Combine, and the Sugar Trust.

But, Mr. President, following the enactment of the Wilson bill and the period of depression that succeeded, there came the enactment of the Dingley law in 1897, raising the duties to give to our producers the American market. It is not necessary for me to pause this afternoon to analyze the reasons back of it, but within three years following the enactment of the Dingley law more than $3,000,000,000 of capital was consolidated into combinations and trusts. Following that, from 1900 down to 1909, when we enacted the Payne-Aldrich law, we had increased until more than $30,000,000,000 of all the wealth of this country invested in manufacturing had been gathered into trusts and combinations, eliminating competition and enabling the organized combinations to fix prices as they pleased. So that feature of the protective tariff system, upon which Hamilton and Blaine and McKinley and the others had builded their argument—competition among domestic industries—had disappeared. The men who were given the American market behind the duties of the Dingley law joined together in great combinations and destroyed competition. They could at their own free will put prices to the very top of the tariff wall. There was nothing to prevent it. That marks the beginning of the era of high prices which to-day bear so heavily upon the people of this country.

Mr. President, when we came to the making of the tariff of 1909, as I said to the Senate at that time, we were revising tariff duties under conditions such as had never before existed in this country. That corollary of protection, which Hamilton and Clay and Blaine and McKinley had said would save the American people from monopoly—competition between the protected industries—had been wiped out by consolidation, agreement, and combination. All competition had been destroyed. We faced a new problem. It was vital that we should make the tariff cover just the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, because there was no competition here to save the consumer from excessive prices if the rate was made higher than this difference. That was the basis of the struggle upon this floor, led by the progressives.

Mr. President, the criticism that is being directed toward some progressives because they do not approve of this so-called reciprocity agreement, constructed along free-trade lines, I think, arises from a misunderstanding of the true position of the progressives at that time. They did not abandon the protective principle. They did not stand for free trade. They voted against reduction of duties again and again whenever the proposed reduction was, as they believed, below the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

So, Mr. President, I say that we stand to-day just where we stood at that time. I have made this digression for the purpose of emphasizing that now. Upon this paper proposition we are appealing for the application of exactly that principle. Although it appeared two years ago that a $2 rate measured the difference in the cost of production, it is nevertheless shown to-day by the most thorough investigation ever made that we can manufacture paper more cheaply than Canada whenever our mills are properly equipped.

So, Mr. President, for my own part, I shall support an amendment to give to the users of print paper the free importation of that product. But I contend, Mr. President, that they are not fairly entitled to that relief at the expense of any other great industry or any other great class in this country. I have been sorely disappointed that the great newspapers of America, controlled by a blind desire to escape the oppression of an unjust combination, have seized upon this opportunity to join with the packers, the railroads, the millers, and other interests to sacrifice agriculture in order that they may have a cheaper product.

It is in testimony, Mr. President, that they are losing to the Paper Trust that controls prices something like $6,000,000 per year; that if they were given the benefit of free print paper they would be able to make a saving in their purchase of print-paper supplies that in the aggregate would amount substantially to that large sum. That is a great temptation, I concede; but, Mr. President, the responsibility of the American newspaper is so great, its mission so important to popular government, that it should ever resist a desire to publish misleading statements. It should at all times lift itself above the sordid temptation of using its columns to increase its own financial gain.

It is in testimony before the Committee on Finance that the newspapers have suppressed the news; that they were instructed by the president of the Publishers' Association to report fully the proreciprocity side of all news matter. I think, Mr. President, that is the blackest page in the newspaper history of the United States. I deeply regret that it has become a part of the history of this legislation; but, Mr. President, it is a stubborn fact.

There is no man who followed the hearings before the Committee on Finance who does not know that those who made their statements in favor of the President's Canadian pact were given very liberal space, were given very prominent position, were exploited under striking headlines in the newspapers of the country. But when the agricultural interests of the country came before the Committee on Finance, demonstrating the gross injustice, the great wrong, and the tremendous injury to agriculture that must result from this pact, notwithstanding the fact that from an economic viewpoint it was the most important testimony taken by the Committee on Finance, it found but meager space in the reports of our great newspapers.

Mr. President, I can not express the great regret and mortification I feel that such a record of betrayal of public trust on the part of the newspapers of America must go down in history.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. STONE. I have no commission to represent the newspapers, and I suppose I would be among the last men in public life who would be selected by the newspapers to represent them. I have not been a favorite among them, and I interrupt the Senator not to defend the newspapers, but because I think his statement is not quite justified by the facts. It was charged that the Associated Press, for example, had given great space to proreciprocity literature and to the proreciprocity contention, which the newspapers had greedily accepted and widely exploited. The facts as developed show, as I understand, that far more space was given to the antireciprocity propaganda by the Associated Press, and by the newspapers generally, than was given by either one or the other in favor of reciprocity. I wish simply to put that statement, as representing my judgment of the facts, against the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin, as representing his opinion of the facts, so that his statement may not go unchallenged to the country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, there is better evidence than the statement either of the Senator from Missouri or myself upon this subject, and I think it will be furnished before the debate on this bill is concluded. I will not take the time of the Senate to go into it more fully than to say that I think probably every member of the Committee on Finance who followed the reports of the newspapers at the time of the hearings would not agree with the Senator from Missouri.

I return, Mr. President, after a very wide digression, for which I apologize to the Senate, to conclude what I have to say in reference to the report of the Tariff Board upon the paper industry.

Finally, the figures showing the number of years machines have been installed confirm the conclusions I have just stated. While only 6.2 per cent of all the machines in the Canadian mills reporting have been installed for a period of 15 to 30 years, the percentage of the ancient outfit in the United States was 34.7 per cent. When I used the word "junk" earlier in my remarks, I did so advisedly. A machine which is kept in a mill for 30 years in this age of rapid improvements is fit only for the scrap pile. It is unfortunate that the Tariff Board failed to give Congress the full benefit of the information it has obtained, by separating the 30-year-old machines from those only 15 years of age, instead of lumping them together.

I undertake to say that it would be clear to any Senator upon a study of this report that the Tariff Board has that information. They should have given it to Congress and the country. It is important to any body of men who are to take the responsibility of fixing tariff duties. I say this, Mr. President, because I hope that it will serve a good purpose. I believe in a tariff commission. I regret that the present board is so limited in its powers, but whatever its scope, its usefulness to Congress and to the country still depends upon the character of its work. For one I will never permit an opportunity to pass which calls for any suggestion or criticism tending to make more useful for the future the work of such a board or commission, because I believe that the protective system depends for its continued existence upon a scientific adjustment of tariff duties, based upon the accurately ascertained difference in the labor cost between this and competing countries. If that investigation shows that there is no difference in the labor cost, then there should be a leveling of schedules to meet that condition. If, on the other hand, there is a difference, and it is determined scientifically, there should be an adjustment of the duties, up or down, in exact accordance with that difference. I repeat, it is to be regretted that the Tariff Board failed in its tables to separate the 30-year-old machines from those only 15 years of age, thus confusing and obscuring the real facts and impairing in some measure at least the value of its work.

The schedules reproduced in its report indicate that the investigators obtained the age of every machine in the mills investigated. Without violating the secrets of individual mills the board could have complied the ages of the machines by groups of 10 years, say, so that we could tell more accurately the age and distribution of machinery in the paper industry of the United States. But even the meager light thrown on the subject by the board is sufficient to show that something is rotten in this industry.

Says the Tariff Board on page 52 of its report:

> Labor efficiency and labor cost per ton of product are almost entirely dependent upon equipment.

Analyzing the cost of paper turned out by 14 machines in three typical plants in this country the report shows that the labor cost in these three plants is as low as 82 cents per ton on one machine and as high as $1.84 on another, or over 124 per cent in excess of the lowest cost.

> It is the difference between this new equipment and higher labor efficiency and lower cost—> or, on the contrary, old and slow machines and high costs, that spell profit or loss in the paper business.

Says the Tariff Board report—

Without wearying the Senate with further details, I trust I am justified in believing that I have cited enough figures, taken from the books of the companies by a Government board, to prove that an assertion that it costs more to produce print paper in this country than in Canada is a myth. The report of the Tariff Board conclusively establishes that such is not the general is not due to the higher cost of labor in this country, but exclusively to the failure on the part of paper manufacturers to equip their mills with up-to-date machinery. To advocate a protective duty under such conditions is equivalent to asking for encouragement from the Government of inefficiency and sloth at the expense of the people. When it is borne in mind that the inefficiency has been due, for the most part, not to lack of capital but to greed, which has caused the capital to be taken from its proper field of application and put to speculative uses of a most objectionable if not criminal character, the hardihood of the speculators clamoring for protection is truly remarkable. To that kind of protection I for one will not subscribe.

Mr. President, the friends of the Canadian pact seem to be very much in conflict as to the meaning of the Root amendment.

The Senator from New York, an ardent supporter of the bill, declares that his amendment harmonizes the bill with the agreement and ought for every reason to pass. He is for this bill as a whole.

The President opposes the Root amendment as hostile to the provisions of the bill to which it relates.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], whose zealous advocacy of this so-called reciprocity measure is well understood, advocates the adoption of the Root amendment as vitally important.

Representative MANN, former chairman of the committee which investigated the manufacture of print paper in Canada and the United States, asserts that he drew the provisions which appear in the Canadian pact on this subject, and that the Root amendment is in conflict with the agreement, and will, if adopted, destroy all opportunity to secure the admission of free print paper from Canada into the United States.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill as a whole. If it is passed, as I hope it will not be, I would prefer it to be made as nearly perfect as possible. I shall cast my vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, although for tactical reasons I voted otherwise in committee. I would have voted for any proposition in committee which I believed would lead to an adverse report from the committee upon this bill. But if this bill is to become a law, I believe there is no justification or warrant to be found in the facts reported by the Tariff Board for any duty upon this industry, and for that reason an amendment should be adopted making print paper and pulp wood free. The State of Wisconsin is one of the large print-paper manufacturing States of this Union. But I will stand for no duty on any industry unless I believe that that duty represents approximately the difference in the cost of production between this and competing countries, unless it be shown that there is some reason for a departure from that rule in a particular case.

I believe that the facts which I have presented to the Senate show most conclusively that there is no justification upon any sound, economic principle, as applied to protective duties, for continuing the duties upon the manufacturing of print paper in this country. For that reason, Mr. President, and because I believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, in the event of the adoption of this Canadian bill, will defeat the very purpose of the paragraph relative to print paper, I shall vote against that amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I wish to say a few words regarding my individual position as to this bill, and a few additional words regarding the parliamentary situation.

I have always been opposed to reciprocity treaties. I believe that these favored arrangements between countries do more to create international jealousy and hostility than they do to create international friendship. I also believe that no nation should embarrass its fiscal system by contractual relations with other countries. I believe that every nation should keep its fiscal system absolutely within its own control; that otherwise, if it enters into contractual relations with one, the principle carried out would mean that it would enter into contractual relations with all, and thus its entire fiscal system becomes a matter of contract instead of a matter of law, a matter of contract embarrassed by the necessity of negotiations with the different countries when relief from the treaty is sought, and when imperative action is required upon the part of a nation with reference to its own finances.

Therefore I have always stood against reciprocity treaties. But I propose to make an exception as to this reciprocity treaty, first, because of our peculiar relation to Canada and the desirability of freer trade with that neighboring country; and, second, because during 18 years of public life, in a vain effort, in connection with others, to secure a scientific system of gradually reducing the tariff through a Tariff Board acting under rules fixed by Congress, I have come to the conclusion that the only way to accomplish anything in the way of hostility to the high protective system is to make a breach in the wall wherever an opportunity offers; and I think a most effectual breach in the protection wall will be made when we divorce the farmer from the manufacturer in the support of a high protective tariff.

We are beginning to realize now what was for a long time denied by the Republican Party, that the duty represents the exact additional cost imposed by American producers upon products which are favored by the tariff, and that whilst the Government of the United States receives as revenue annually about $300,000,000, the beneficiaries of the tariff are able to impose upon the people of the United States in increased prices for their products a tax of $3,000,000,000. Whilst the Government receives about one-tenth of this annual tax imposed upon the people, the manufacturers receive nine-tenths.

It is true that the farmer as yet has not received benefit from the tariff. His participation has been postponed to the time when consumption, in this country, of his products shall equal production. Then, with no exportable surplus, the tariff duty would be added to the domestic price. I wish to prevent the farmer from adding that duty to his price and thus exacting from domestic consumers 30 per cent more than the world's price for food products, and I believe that this is the time to do it and that this is the way to do it. I wish to prevent the possibility of a farmer's graft and to take away the actuality of the manufacturer's graft, and the best way to accomplish this is to prevent any community of interest in the tariff graft.

Mr. President, regarding the parliamentary situation, it was demonstrated the other day by a vote of instruction to the Finance Committee that the progressives of the Senate were in the control of the Senate; that the so-called dominant party had lost control; and that the control was transferred to the progressives of this body, consisting of about 40 Democrats and about 16 or 18 progressive Republicans.

I took advantage of the opportunity then to congratulate the Senate upon the restoration of self-government here. For since the coming of the progressive Republicans into this body, a coming which was welcomed by the Democrats, we have seen a gradual advance in self-government by the Senate. The control of leaders, so-called, has been done away with. The domination of committees has been done away with. Committees are now regarded as the servants of the Senate, subject to its command. We no longer have the old domination of committees, strong in their membership and strong in the traditions of the Senate.

The question now arises as to what these allied forces, allied not in secret meeting, but openly in the Senate and before the entire country, having secured the control of the Senate, with the attaching responsibility, propose to do regarding tariff reform and regarding other progressive and constructive legislation concerning which public opinion is now made up.

Mr. President, representative government has been thrown into discredit in this country by reason of the fact that the representatives of the people have failed to respond to public opinion. The Senate itself has become largely discredited in public opinion by reason of the fact that it has not responded to public opinion. The House was similarly discredited at one time, but it is now reestablished in the good opinion of the people of the country by the action of the dominant party there, acting in party conference, adopting a specific legislative program looking to definite results, and advancing with dignity and precision toward accomplishment.

Can we not undertake the work of reestablishing the Senate in the esteem of the great American people? And can not these allied forces that gained so signal a victory a few days ago, in the open, not in secret caucus or conference, but before the entire American people, determine here and now upon a legislative program that will involve not only these questions of tariff reform, but other questions of reform, of progressive and constructive action concerning which public opinion is made up? Why should we not act just as decisively as the House of Representatives has, mapping out what matters we propose to undertake in legislation and what matters we propose to undertake in committee consideration, with a view to action at the next session?

Four months and more of time are now before us—time which may be frittered away by such sessions as we have been having, but four months of effective and triumphant work if the progressives of this body determine upon a definite line of action.

The best way of securing an early adjournment is to determine upon a definite line of action, first, with reference to the matters which are to be acted upon at this session; second, regarding the matters which are to be considered by our idle committees with a view to action early in the next regular session. I have offered a resolution upon this line presenting nine questions for immediate action, of which six have already been acted upon in the House, and seven other questions for consideration by our idle committees with a view to action at the next session. These questions relate to reduction in military expenditure; the creation of a board or commission of interstate trade, with powers of investigation, correction, and recommendation to Congress; monetary legislation; and other matters as to the necessity of which public opinion is formed.

Mr. President, we are met by the embarrassment that the Democrats in disposing of these matters are confronted by the possibility of shifting changes as to their allies. The Democrats for the most part believe that it will imperil this reciprocity bill if they allow it to be amended. In taking that position, if they do take it, they must necessarily ally themselves with the reactionary portion of the Republican Party, with whom they have no sympathy, and abandon for the time being those allies with whom they are in sympathy, and with whom they have acted in the progressive program that has been before the Senate for some years.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I am unwilling to imperil this bill. It is my inclination to vote against any amendment which will involve any chance of imperiling it. I can only be shaken in that view by a definite program presented with the absolute assurance of accomplishment.

Certainly the progressives of this body can take up and pass not only the reciprocity treaty, but bills reducing high protective duties and involving other measures of reform and constructive legislation which are imperatively demanded. I am aware that in this great work the Democrats can not expect to accomplish all that they hope to accomplish. I am aware that they may not be able to pass the bills in the precise form in which they passed the House. The difference, however, between the Democrats and the progressive Republicans is that whilst the progressive Republicans can not, consistently with their principles, go as far as the Democrats would in the matter of tariff reform, the Democrats acting upon their principles can go as far in the line of reduction as the progressive Republicans are willing to go, and can justify themselves before their party and before the country upon that issue.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that this alliance which has put the Senate practically in the control of the progressives of this body, which has given them not only control, but responsibility, will be fruitful of results. Such beneficial results can not be accomplished without patient effort, without a firm determination to come together, and without a firm resolve to definitely act upon a legislative program. I shall bring up for consideration the resolutions regarding a definite legislative program, to which I have referred, at some day in the near future.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall not occupy more than a moment of the time of the Senate. I do not attach much importance to the vote that is to be taken, but there is, however, enough of importance in it to demand attention. I wish to give as much consideration to the industries of my own country as to those of a foreign nation. If I thought, Mr. President, that it would be an injury to the newspapers of this country to incorporate the amendment, I should not vote for it; but I have made some calculations from figures based on the weekly newspapers of the country. The paper that sends out 52 issues, an eight-page paper, containing six columns, weighs on an average 2 ounces. The duty on print paper is $3.75 per ton.

Now, we will admit that the paper manufacturers in this country get all that duty. I understand that Mr. Norris, testifying before the Finance Committee, said that there was a difference of $4.20 per ton in the cost of print paper in this country and Canada. I take it that he included the freight, but I do not suppose that the newspaper men in this country expect by the passage of the bill that freight will be eliminated. Two ounces to a paper means eight papers to the pound. Fifty-two issues means 6½ pounds per year for one paper or one subscriber. That, Mr. President, means 1.21 cents per year for each subscriber. I do not believe that the papers in this country will sustain any loss if this amendment is adopted. I am speaking now of the weekly papers of the country.

I shall vote for the so-called Root amendment. I know, Mr. President, that we can not amend the bill so as to make a good bill of it. In my judgment, the only thing that should be done with the bill is to make a motion to have it indefinitely postponed.

Mr. President, I intend some day in the near future to make a few observations upon the reciprocity measure. I simply wanted to say these few words justifying my position in voting for the Root amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 27, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 26, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, source of all wisdom, power, and goodness, look with compassion upon us, pardon our sins, illumine our minds, impart unto us strength sufficient for our needs, fill our hearts with love for Thee and our fellow men that we may measure up to the highest ideals of manhood in whatsoever we undertake this day, that we may prove ourselves worthy as children of the living God. In the spirit of the Master, amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, for three weeks, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. TALCOTT of New York, one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOWELL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

CORRECTING ENROLLMENT OF CERTAIN APPROPRIATION ACTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House House joint resolution 1, with Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 1, to correct errors in enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911.

The amendments were read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York, Mr. BURLESON of Texas, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report a bill to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations. (H. Rept. 55.)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered now in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he move to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would have to do that by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I know that. It will probably be subject to a point of order, but probably nobody will make the point about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a bill to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk has just reported. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if we can agree upon the time for debate, so that there will be a definite understanding about it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is not necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Perhaps we shall not need it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, with Mr. RUCKER of Missouri in the chair.

On assuming the chair Mr. RUCKER of Missouri was greeted with applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations to supply deficiencies, which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The text of the bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, namely:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $12,850.

For stationery for Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates from Territories, and Resident Commissioners, and for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $1,000.

For furniture, and materials for repairs of the same, $16,800.

For compensation of the clerk to the Speaker's table for preparing the Digest of the Rules for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, $1,000.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The amount authorized to be expended for the employment of personal services under the appropriation in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1911, for the enforcement of certain acts of Congress to prevent the spread of contagious and communicable diseases in the District of Columbia, is hereby increased from $10,000 to $10,200.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries several items to supply deficiencies in the appropriations to enable the House properly to conduct its business.

The first item is for $12,850 for miscellaneous items of the House. The appropriation for the current fiscal year was $75,000, but there had been expended out of this appropriation up to the 1st of April $57,000, leaving a balance to the credit of the appropriation at that date of $18,000. Since that time certain outstanding obligations which had been incurred have been presented, which amounted in all to about $6,627, and since that time there have been authorized by resolutions of the House certain employees whose compensation aggregates $2,600 a month, and under the resolutions authorizing investigations of various organizations employees aggregating an expenditure of $1,700 a month have been employed.

In addition to this, the witnesses who have been brought here by these various committees have incurred obligations which require these expenditures. So that a careful computation shows that it will require for the balance of the fiscal year the amount specified in the bill.

For furniture for the House of Representatives there was appropriated $20,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he leaves the first item.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. These items included in this $12,850 are all items for which resolutions have been passed authorizing their payment out of the contingent fund, are they not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not entirely out of the contingent fund. Five new places were created, the compensation of which is $10,000 annually, and the compensation attached to these places was payable out of the contingent fund. Other places in the House, the compensation of which aggregated $82,000, were abolished. The money for the compensation of those places is carried in the legislative act for next year, and it will not be expended. In addition to the five places created, the compensation of which is to be paid out of the contingent fund until provision is otherwise made, positions to be filled by 12 clerks and 1 assistant clerk to committees at $125 per month, payable out of the contingent fund until otherwise provided, have been created.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to say to the gentleman that the information I wanted to get in regard to this item was whether or not it would not have been better to make a specific appropriation here to the effect that it was for the purpose of replenishing this fund. Otherwise, if a subsequent resolution is passed providing for the payment of anything out of the contingent fund, it could not be paid out of the money appropriated in this item here, could it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. On the 1st of July the appropriation for the fiscal year 1912 becomes available.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand this is for the present fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And it is not anticipated that any new authorizations will be made out of the contingent fund during the current year.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not customary, is it—I will ask the gentleman—in making appropriations for the contingent fund, to specify the items for which the money must be paid or for which it is appropriated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Only in the manner here specified. There are certain miscellaneous items, expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, specifically authorized by the House, for which the appropriation was $75,000; and the charges properly made against that appropriation will be $12,850 in excess of that sum.

Mr. NORRIS. Ordinarily, when an appropriation is made for the contingent fund, there is no attempt to specify the particular uses to which it can be applied, is there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; not any more than this, that the contingent fund is divided into a miscellaneous account—furniture, fuel, and oil, and several other items that are grouped—but there are a number of items under the miscellaneous fund. This is one of the items, and out of this particular item these charges are payable. In addition to what I have stated already, there are packing boxes, stationery for Members, postage stamps for the Postmaster.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a specific item in this bill for stationery on page 2.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will explain that.

Mr. NORRIS. So that would not be included here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The manner in which the items are divided is as I have indicated. In supplying deficiencies, the language of the act in which the original appropriation is made is always used.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The first item, $12,850, seems to have been figured down quite closely, so there must have been before the committee, or before some one, at least, a statement showing particularly what this is for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have that statement here.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman give it to us?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chief Clerk of the House, under whom the disbursing officer is, made an estimate of the money required, which is as follows:

Due on telegraph and telephone bills, $4,850.
Ice bill, $700.
Expenses of special committees, $3,500.
Salaries of employees, $2,600.

And a number of small items grouped as sundries, $1,200.

The expenses of the select committees were estimated by requesting the chairmen of those committees to state the amounts of money that would be required to compensate witnesses who were expected to be subpœnaed prior to the end of this month, and, as accurately as could be estimated, these are the items that will be required.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has read an item of $4,000 for telephone and telegraph messages.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; $4,850.

Mr. MANN. How much of that is for telegraphing and how much for telephoning?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not obtain the figures in that way. The items have been approved by the proper committee. The telephone bills were estimated upon the amount fixed under the contracts. The telegraph bills, of course, are indefinite. They depend upon the number of telegrams sent. This is the amount that is now due on these bills, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. I think it is interesting, perhaps, to know whether this amount is partly produced by the special investigating committees; and if so, to what extent?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some of the telegraphing is due to the special committees, but a very small percentage. These telegraph bills, as the gentleman is aware, arise from the messages sent by Members, at Government rates, chargeable to the House of Representatives.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The great bulk of the charges come in that way.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that is rather an unusual amount, yet it may not be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the information is that it was not an unusual amount while Congress is in session. The number of telegrams sent and charged while Congress is in session is much in excess of the number sent when Congress is not in session. Members are here and people are telegraphing from all over the country to them on account of various official matters, and they are sending messages to all parts of the country.

Mr. MANN. I thought possibly that the system might be changed, with the change in policy as to economy, so that the expense would be much less, and that no one on that side of the House would feel at liberty to use the telephone and the telegraph at public expense.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not aware that Members are permitted to use the long-distance telephone at public expense. I have seen no such bills. There are installed in the Capitol and in the Office Building telephones, and Members have the privilege of telephoning to any part of the city under the contract made with the telephone companies for such service.

Mr. MANN. Is not a part of this expense for long-distance telephoning?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information to that effect.

Mr. GARNER. None of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no knowledge of any charge here for long-distance telephoning.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to segregate the expense of the special committees among the committees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I have not that information. These committees were authorized to expend up to $25,000 each—two of them—which expenditures are to be paid upon the certificates of the chairmen of the different committees, after having been passed on by the Committee on Accounts, and when these accounts are passed in that manner the Committee on Appropriations has not attempted to further audit the accounts.

Mr. MANN. That may be, but I think the House is entitled to know when it makes an appropriation, or at some time, what expense the different committees are incurring. While that information might come from the Committee on Accounts, still that committee is not coming before the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not able to give at this time any statement of the exact amount expended by these committees to investigate the sugar concerns and the steel concerns, except to say that the various committees that are investigating different matters have employees that are costing $1,700 a month.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to say out of what fund is being paid the clerk hire?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Seventeen hundred dollars' worth of special employees in these various committees. The employees of these committees draw in compensation in the aggregate $1,700 a month.

Mr. GARNER. They are being paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. MANN. I know, but there are a number of contingent funds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are being paid out of this fund which specifically provides for miscellaneous items and expenses of the special and select committees.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not give any estimate for the clerk hire, did he, in giving the amount of this deficiency?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can state what it is. The expenses of special committees, $3,500. That includes mileage, employees, and whatever other expenses there are.

Mr. MANN. But the regular expenditure committees—out of what fund is their clerk hire paid?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Out of this particular item.

Mr. MANN. They are not special committees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I stated they were being paid out of this fund.

Mr. MANN. But they are not special committees. Are the clerks for these committees being paid out of this fund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are, at $125 a month, and they aggregate about $833 a month.

Mr. MANN. Well, we were told the other day that a large number of witnesses had fees being held up on these special committees and could not get the money. I do not see where that comes in, if you are paying the clerk hire at the rate of $1,700 a month out of this item and the total of the item is only $3,000, knowing the amount is expended for witness fees. I think it would be interesting if some one were able to tell us.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to tell how much has been expended by these particular committees up to this time. It might be interesting to the gentleman to know that there was paid by the present officials of the House out of this fund some $6,627 for witness fees for the witnesses in the investigation of the friar lands.

Mr. MANN. That is interesting to know, but no more interesting than it would be to know how much of the money you now propose to appropriate is being paid for witness fees which have already been incurred by other committees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is only one specific statement as to witness fees thus far, and that is fees for the witnesses for the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. They have expended $1,200 for witness fees.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to say I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and since the 17th day of April we have had 31 meetings and have examined 30 witnesses and recalled 13. That committee has not expended a dollar for witnesses. The only expense incurred has been on account of printing the hearings of said committee. There is no item in this deficiency bill for said committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has examined witnesses who are here in Washington.

Mr. AUSTIN. And some from a distance, a number not connected with the department.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit, does the gentleman from Tennessee have an idea that witnesses are to get an expense account later on? Does he undertake to state the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department will not incur any expenses?

Mr. AUSTIN. We have proceeded with the investigation thus far and not a single witness has cost the Government a dollar.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman, the House, and the country are to be congratulated.

Mr. AUSTIN. And we are of the opinion that we ought not to pay a Government officeholder a per diem.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the law these witnesses need not come unless they be subpœnaed, and if they be subpœnaed they are entitled to a certain mileage and $2 a day for attendance on the meetings of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Does that apply to an official of the Government who is already drawing a salary?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is my recollection of the statute.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am quite certain it is. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], I am quite sure, is very familiar with it, because certain Government officials were brought here, and they presented claims for per diem, and I think the gentleman was compelled to allow the claim which they presented.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I think that a Government official only gets his expenses.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from New York referred to me, I think there is a rule of the House fixing the per diem and mileage to be paid witnesses before committees, making no distinction between those who are and those who are not in the Government service, but it has not been customary for Government officials to charge a per diem.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that we called this matter in relation to a per diem due to Government officials testifying before our committee to the attention of the Comptroller of the Treasury, and he stated to us verbally that they were not entitled to per diem pay.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I can perhaps give some particular information in respect to the expenses of one of the expenditures committees, and that is that Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. That committee has been about as busy as any of these committees, and we have incurred the expense of one witness in the amount of about $30. That was the per diem and traveling expenses of this one witness. We subpœnaed a number of parties here in the city—Government officials—but I have been and am yet under the impression that they ought not to be allowed fees, for they are drawing a salary from the Government, and the Government is entitled to their time.

Mr. GARNER. That impression is correct.

Mr. HAMLIN. And they have not been allowed any witness fees by me, and I would have to be thoroughly convinced that they were entitled to it under the law before I would approve an account of that kind; but we subpœnaed one witness, not an employee of the Government, from outside of the city, and of course he was allowed a per diem and mileage amounting to somewhere in the neighborhood of $30, the same being $2 per day and mileage at the rate of 5 cents per mile. This is the only expense our committee has incurred for witnesses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will read to the gentleman Rule XXXVII:

> The rule for paying witnesses subpœnaed to appear before the House or its committees shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $2; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of 5 cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial.

There is no exception.

Mr. HAMLIN. The rule may make no exception, but I do not believe that the intention of the law is that where a department is under investigation and the committee feels the necessity if bringing the officials of that department before them to explain their management or other matters of the department, that those officials shall have a right to charge the Government for the time they are before that committee making explanations. I do not believe it is the intention of the law to pay them, and I will not O. K. a fee bill in their favor unless compelled to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if there is not a statute which covers this particular point? I understand there is such a statute. But even if there were not, I would like to say to the gentleman from New York that it seems perfectly plain that that rule of the House would not apply to a Government official, and is not intended to apply to a man who is already paid a salary which is going on at the time he is testifying. If it did, you might have Government officials going around from one of these committees to the other and testifying before five or six different committees in the same day and getting per diem from each. I think it is a general rule that no official, even if there were no statute bearing on the subject, can draw two salaries at the same time from the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is inaccurate. The only law upon that subject is one providing that no official of the Federal Government can draw two salaries if one of them shall be in excess of $2,500. The per diem for witnesses is not considered at all as a salary. It is to compensate the witness for the additional expense to which he has been put.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand it is to compensate him for his time. His mileage is to compensate him to that extent. Take a Government official, any official who is here in office in Washington, and it is that kind of witnesses that appear before these investigating committees, drawing salaries, and subject to no extra expense. It costs them no more to come here than to go to their ordinary place of business, and, their salaries going on at the same time, it seems to me there would be no reason for any of these officials, employees or clerks of the Government here in Washington, to get either per diem or mileage.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no intimation, let me say to the gentleman, that any official in Washington will receive or has received any amount as per diem when he has been brought before any of these committees.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman from Nebraska that so far as I know, as a member of the Committee on Accounts, no account has been allowed to any Government official for attendance upon a committee, either in the way of mileage or per diem.

I wanted to make some inquiry of the gentleman from New York as to his construction of the law. Let us suppose a case. Let us suppose a committee should refuse a Government employee an account for mileage or per diem. Would he have any standing in court to recover on that account?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know that my opinion would be of much value at this time.

Mr. GARNER. It is of considerable interest to determine this question, because no committee desires to turn down an account which the law demands it shall pay.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe that under the rule the Government officials are entitled to per diem when they are subpœnaed at the place of trial. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will state to the gentleman from New York that there is an express Federal statute that no Government official shall receive more than his actual expenses. I can give the gentleman that section of the statutes if he desires.

Mr. AUSTIN. He is not even entitled to his mileage? It must be actual expenses?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; it must be actual expenses.

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to know, if each one of these accounts was determined either by a regular or special committee, whether the Committee on Accounts would be authorized to refuse or to allow the account?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have not made an examination of the statutes recently so as to be qualified to pass on this question. It does not come before the Committee on Appropriations. These accounts are first approved by the chairman of the committee who subpœnas the witnesses, and then they must be certified by the Committee on Accounts. When both of these bodies have certified the accounts, I have assumed, as the Committee on Appropriations have no power to interfere with their certification, that they have examined the law and have certified the accounts in accordance with the law.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will state to the gentleman from New York that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], in the presence of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department on Saturday, examined the statute, and he correctly quoted it in his statement a few minutes ago. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York to accept the following amendment:

At the end of line 11:

"Provided, That no part of said sum shall be paid to witnesses as per diem who are on the pay rolls of the United States Government."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; I can not accept that amendment. If they are not entitled to it under the law, it is not necessary. If they are entitled to it under the law, it ought to be known definitely. This is simply to appropriate money to pay witnesses who have been called or are to be called before the end of this month.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman quoted a rule which gives such witnesses $2 a day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not a matter that we should attempt to regulate at this time. The Committee on Appropriations, through the proper official of the House, received the estimates from the various committees as to the amounts that would be required. They did not send in estimates for any Government officials who were to be brought here to testify. For instance, the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department brought certain Indians from the Territory of Arizona, and some $1,200 was required to pay their expenses. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] submitted a list of the names of the witnesses whom he proposed to call before his committee, the places from which they were to come, the number of miles they were to travel, and the mileage to which they would be entitled. It was upon such information as I have detailed that the estimate of the amount required was made up.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman from New York please tell us whether in the list of witnesses certified by the gentleman from Georgia there are any Government officials, and whether per diem and mileage is proposed to be allowed them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My information is to the effect that there were none.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman from New York a few minutes ago read from the rules of the House that all witnesses are entitled to a per diem of $2 a day. As I understand it, in the payment of these witness fees the law and the opinion of the Comptroller of the Treasury govern, and not the rule of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is true.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to submit this question to the gentleman from New York: Suppose that a committee not authorized by a specific resolution at this session of Congress desires the presence of a witness from a distance and sends for that witness. Will that witness be entitled to mileage and per diem?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unless the committee are empowered to send for witnesses, they can not subpœna them. If somebody should comply with a request of the committee when the committee had no power to subpœna, I suppose there would be no legal obligation to pay his mileage or per diem. And when a committee has the power to subpœna witnesses it is a question whether a witness responding voluntarily to a call without a subpœna is entitled to mileage. But I do not believe I should be asked to attempt to settle at this time all of the questions that may arise in the minds of Members, first as to the power of any committee to bring witnesses here and then as to whether those witnesses would be entitled to compensation if they come.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have the statute now. Section 849 of the Revised Statutes of 1848 provides:

No officer of the United States courts in any State or Territory, or in the District of Columbia, shall be entitled to witness fees for attending before any court or commissioner where he is officiating.

Section 850 provides:

When any clerk or other officer of the United States is sent away from his place of business as a witness for the Government his necessary expenses, stated in items and sworn to, in going, returning, and attendance on the court, shall be audited and paid; but no mileage or other compensation in addition to his salary shall in any case be allowed.

Now, I do not find any other Federal statute relating to the fees of Federal officers.

Mr. OLMSTED. The statute just read applies only to testimony before Federal courts or commissioners thereof, and to cases where employees are summoned as witnesses for the Government in court. It has no relation whatever to the testimony of witnesses before a committee of this House. That provision is found in the rule of this House which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has already read.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, having investigated this matter on previous occasions, by reason of certain claims for witness fees having been referred to the Committee on Accounts during the last session, in which claims for mileage were preferred against the Government for witnesses who had attended investigations authorized by the last Congress, known as the friar lands investigation, I became satisfied that although the parties who appeared before the committee and testified were in the service of the Government, there was no law which would prevent them from receiving mileage.

I myself thought witnesses occupying that relation to the Government ought not to be paid mileage, and it was investigated by the Committee on Accounts. While I did not agree to pay, the committee agreed to pay, and I found myself in the position where I was compelled, by reason of no law to sustain my position, to acquiesce in that demand. The statute read by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] applies, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] well said, to witnesses in courts or before commissioners authorized to take depositions, and the language is that no witness in the service of the Government who is summoned as a witness for the Government shall be allowed anything except his expenses. Now, the only law upon the subject that I can find or am familiar with is the rule of the House which provides for the summoning of witnesses and for the payment of the fees. Up to 1876 the law was that witnesses were paid $4 a day, and the act of 1876 did contain a provision limiting the amount to $2 a day and had this provision in it:

Provided, That witnesses residing in the District of Columbia, and not in the service of the Government of said District or of said United States, who shall be summoned to give testimony before any committee of the House of Representatives, shall not be allowed exceeding $2 for each day's service.

Prior to that time the allowance for witnesses everywhere was $4 a day, and this act fixed it at $2 a day, and the rule of the House fixed the attendance of witnesses at $2 a day. So that there is no law, or the law is deficient in that respect so far as I am informed, that says that a person in the employ of the United States Government shall not receive anything but his actual expenses when he attends as a witness summoned before a committee of Congress. I can see very readily why it ought to be the rule, and I can see very readily why Congress should enact such a law or why the House should amend its rules providing that; but here are witnesses who reside in the District of Columbia who when summoned are undoubtedly entited to $2 a day, and here are witnesses who reside out of the District of Columbia who are summoned and who under the law, if you apply the law of witnesses in the United States courts, have to have their fees tendered to them to attend out of the State of their residence and are entitled to $2 a day and their mileage.

Mr. GARNER. In the last analysis, Mr. Chairman, it resolves itself into this: That if a witness in the employ of the Government, say, in the State of Georgia, is summoned before a committee of the House, having authority to demand his presence, and that committee refuses to allow him anything other than his actual expenses, and the Committee on Accounts in turn refuses to O. K. a voucher for anything other than his actual expenses, would he have any standing in court to recover his claim?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I think that he would. He certainly would have a claim before the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GARNER. He would certainly have a claim against the Government, but whether Congress would allow that claim is discretionary with Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think it is not discretionary with Congress. I think a man who receives a subpœna from Congress under the knowledge of the fact that the rules of both Houses provide that he shall be paid so much per diem and so much mileage would have a claim against the United States Government which could be asserted in the courts. You can not compel him to come unless you tender him his fees, and a witness may decline to come when you tender him his fees. That is my impression.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for the gentleman's knowledge of the law and I do not know that I quite understand him. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that if the officials of these departments should be summoned before a committee of the House to be interrogated as to matters in their department they would be entitled to $2 per diem as witness fees?

Mr. BARTLETT. Living in the District?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is no law that says he is not entitled to it.

Mr. GARNER. The same rule would have to apply to him as to any other witness.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The rule provides that he shall not be entitled to a per diem.

Mr. BARTLETT. Nothing shall be paid for traveling expenses.

Mr. HAMLIN. He has no traveling expenses. He lives here, but would he be entitled to his per diem?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think he would. The passage which I read of 1876 provided that—well, I will read it again; and here is the only thing that I know of upon the subject. I read from the deficiency appropriation bill of 1876:

Provided, That witnesses residing in the District of Columbia and not in the service of the government of said District or of said United States who shall be summoned to give testimony before any committee of the House of Representatives shall not be allowed exceeding $2 for each day's service.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not in the service of the Government?

Mr. BARTLETT. I read the gentleman the language of the statute.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then the opposite of that expression would mean that those in the employ of the government of the District or of the United States would not be entitled to a per diem. This is exactly what I thought to be the law, or at least the spirit of the law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Applying the familiar rule of law that the inclusion of one proposition would exclude the other, I think it would tend to exclude it, although the statute has never been construed, as I understand it, by a committee or the House where it reached a record shape.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the construction I would put upon it, and I believe it is right, and shall continue to so hold as chairman of one of these committees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the next is an item of $1,000 for stationery. That is to supply stationery for the officers and the House. The item for furniture and materials for the repair to the same; the amount recommended is $16,800.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from New York yield in reference to that item?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Which item?

Mr. GARNER. The item for furniture and materials for repairs for same, $16,800. Has the gentleman the estimate in reference to the items covering that item from the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The appropriation for the current year was $20,000. There had been expended and obligated prior to the beginning of this session of Congress $13,850, which left a balance available of $6,150. The Clerk of the House submitted an estimate of the various amounts which are due and which must be met. In the first place, there were portraits of the Speakers of the House being painted in oil, which cost $500 a piece.

Mr. GARNER. How many of those?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In all, I think, there were 19 of them, but 10 will be presented. Five thousand dollars is needed to pay for 10 of those portraits. There is due for 300 typewriters, at an average of $45 each, $13,500. There is due Moses & Co., for desks and chairs, $1,000; Dulin & Martin, for coolers and stands, $1,000; Harvey & Co., for bookcases, $1,200; electric fans, $600; and the General Fire Proofing Co., $650; which makes a total of $22,950; to pay which there was on hand $6,150; thus requiring an additional appropriation of $16,800.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman who audits these accounts to see the Government is not overcharged.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Accounts audits all payments from the contingent fund, and their audit is conclusive under the law.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Committee on Accounts audited these particular items?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The request for these specific items was submitted by the Clerk of the House to the Committee on Appropriations, and when that request was made the chairman of the Committee on Accounts was requested to make an inquiry and to state to the Committee on Appropriations whether the particular amounts were due and whether the obligations incurred were proper, and the chairman of the Committee on Accounts made such a statement to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LLOYD. If the gentleman will permit, these claims have all been audited by the Committee on Accounts, or they have been presented and not audited, but they were claims pending and thoroughly valid claims against the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT. And they will be audited before they are paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the next item is $1,000 for the preparation of the Manual and Digest. Annually there is appropriated in the legislative bill for the clerk at the Speaker's desk $3,600 and $1,000 additional for the preparation of the Manual and Digest. The appropriation for the current fiscal year was paid to the prior occupant of the place for the preparing of the Manual and Digest at the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, and this item is to compensate the present occupant charged with this work.

Mr. GARNER. Is that to be an annual or a session or a Congress appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is appropriated annually, Mr. Chairman, and has been paid, so far as my investigation goes, for the preparation of the Digest at the regular sessions of Congress. No such condition has arisen as in the present Congress during the past 16 years, if I recall correctly. One gentleman occupied the position during those years, and he was paid the compensation since the work has been delegated to him. Two things occurred to the Committee on Appropriations: One was that the intention was to fix annually the compensation of this employee at $4,600 a year; the other, in the language of the act, that it was intended as an additional compensation for this particular work. This latter view seemed to be the proper one, since prior to the Fifty-seventh Congress the Manual and Digest was prepared by the Journal clerk, and a similar appropriation had been made for the purpose to him since about 1876.

Judge Crisp came to Washington upon the adjournment of the Sixty-first Congress and was engaged prior to the convening of the present Congress in aiding in the arrangement of the rules, and he since has prepared the Manual and Digest, in accordance with a resolution of the House. After viewing the matter from all sides, the committee believed that he was entitled to be paid the money at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Has it been customary to pay this amount, or any amount, for each session, or has it been customary to make an appropriation of $1,000 for the entire fiscal year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The appropriation is contained in the legislative appropriation bill—the annual appropriation bill. The language of the act is, according to my recollection, "For the preparation of the Manual and Digest, $1,000." That sum was appropriated for the current fiscal year.

Mr. NORRIS. This appropriation here is for this special session only?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am informed that this $1,000 is paid, upon the presentation to the Public Printer of the manual completed, to the person who compiled it.

Mr. NORRIS. There will be another session of Congress, or at least a part of one in the same year. What is the reason the committee in this bill has designated this as compensation for a particular session? Why not designate it as compensation for the year? Then there would be no doubt as to what it would be for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not, I will say to the gentleman, compensation for the year. It is compensation for the preparation of the Manual and Digest for this session of Congress. That is the work for which the compensation is paid. Previously——

Mr. NORRIS. This session of Congress will end before the next fiscal year is ended, and another session will take its place, and if you did this at every session of Congress the salary would be increased for each session of Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not the intention.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is not the intention, but it strikes me that is what you are really doing here under the language of the appropriation.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I would like to say that it occurs to me that this is a special appropriation for special work done at this session, and that the clerk to the Speaker, under the statute, receives $3,500 a year, and the appropriation bill each year carries $1,000 extra for him, making his salary $4,500 each year.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. GARNER. Now, this is an extra $1,000 for special work done at this session.

Mr. BURLESON. It is $1,000 for this particular work—the preparation of the Manual and Digest.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; for this particular session of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. That means that for the coming fiscal year there will be $2,000 extra paid for this work instead of $1,000.

Mr. GARNER. No. This is part of a fiscal year. The appropriation for the next fiscal year has already been made—$3,500 for his salary and $1,000 extra, making a total of $4,500.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman tell the amount correctly? It is $3,600, plus $1,000.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, I thought it was $3,500. It is $3,600. But this compensation, as I understand it, is for special work performed by Judge Crisp for this special session of Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. And also, may I say, done under a resolution from the Committee on Rules, directing him to do it?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; and authorized by the House. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman that——

Mr. NORRIS. Permit me to say right there that that will be from the 4th of March up to the 30th day of June, will it not?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Then he will get for that particular time $1,000 extra, and for the next 12 months he will get another $1,000 extra.

Mr. GARNER. Then he will get the regular appropriation made by Congress for him for that session.

Mr. NORRIS. Then this increases the annual pay.

Mr. BURLESON. No. He gets $1,000 for the preparation of this Manual and Digest. At the beginning of the next session, of course, he makes another, and gets $1,000 for that.

Mr. GARNER. Now, I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York. Would it not be better to make this salary $4,600 at a statutory salary, instead of making these different appropriations? It looks in the separate bills as a donation, this extra $1,000, whereas, as a matter of custom, it is a part of his duty, and it ought to be statutory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, that perhaps is true, but that is not the situation that confronts us now. There were some changes made in the rules of the House, and a new edition of the Digest and Manual had to be prepared, and the work was done by Judge Crisp under the direction of the House. It has been the practice to pay $1,000 to the individual who performed the work. I am inclined to believe that it has become permanently fixed, and one of the reasons for it was the belief that the clerk at the Speaker's table earned more than the compensation fixed in the law, and there was a desire properly to compensate him for the important work he does in the House.

It seemed to the committee that went over these various phases of the matter that it was proper to recommend the payment of $1,000 at this time for this work.

Mr. GARNER. Would it not be better in the future to carry his total salary in one bulk sum, rather than to appear to donate $1,000 in connection with this work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will yield to me, this is in no sense a donation.

Mr. GARNER. I did not mean to be understood as saying that it is.

Mr. BARTLETT. It ought not to be designated as such. It is an absolute payment for work and services done by the clerk at the Speaker's table, under authority from the House—most arduous, painstaking, and particular work which the House was in need of and required.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield for just a moment?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia that by saying to the gentleman from New York that this ought to be placed in one item of annual salary I did not mean to be understood that this was a donation. I simply say that instead of appropriating $3,600 as a salary and then $1,000 for certain work, which has been the custom for a number of years, it seems to me it would be better to say that the clerk at the Speaker's table is entitled to $4,600 a year, and make a bulk appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Permit me to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Texas: Until about eight years ago this money was paid to the Clerk of the House or to the Journal clerk for the preparation of the Manual and Digest. At that time the work devolved upon the then clerk at the Speaker's table. Now, it is just possible that a situation will arise in the House where neither the Journal clerk, who may be appointed, nor the clerk at the Speaker's table will be sufficiently qualified to prepare the Manual and Digest, and whoever has charge of it may desire to devolve the work of preparing the first Manual and Digest upon some one who is not an officer of the House. I believe that is the reason the item has been carried separately.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted just a word, to finish what I was saying. I understand the language of the law is that the clerk at the Speaker's table shall receive $3,600 a year, and in addition thereto $1,000 for preparing the Manual and Digest. It is as much a part of the compensation of the clerk at the Speaker's table as the mileage of the Members is a part of their compensation. The law provides that a Member shall receive so much salary and in addition thereto—that is the language of the statute—so much for mileage. Now, we came here to attend this session. The mileage was not available, and we passed a bill making it available, and have received it. The former clerk at the Speaker's table, Mr. HINDS, drew this $1,000. He was entitled to it. There is no criticism upon that at all. He was entitled to it under the proper construction of the law. Then it devolved upon the present clerk at the Speaker's table, authorized to do so by the resolution adopted by the House, to prepare this Manual, which he has done. It was not contemplated that there would be an extra session. When the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was passed nobody knew that we were going to have an extra session. Nobody anticipated that. No one could look into the mind of the President to determine what he was going to do; but the extra session has been called, and we are here, and this gentleman has performed the work. He is entitled to this compensation, and the only way to provide for it is to put it in a deficiency bill. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I myself am perfectly willing to incorporate into the law a salary of $4,600, and make it incumbent upon the clerk at the Speaker's table, for this compensation, to prepare this Digest; but that is not now the law, and we must face the conditions as they present themselves. It occurs to me that this item is not subject to criticism, is a meritorious one, and ought to be passed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The last item in this bill is one making available $200 additional for personal services for the contagious-disease service in the District of Columbia. The appropriation for contagious-disease service in the District of Columbia was $24,500. When the appropriation bill for the current fiscal year was being prepared, it was ascertained that a very large proportion of this money—$18,000 or $19,000—was expended for personal services.

On the recommendation of the committee a limitation of $10,000 was placed on the amount available for personal services. For the next ensuing fiscal year the limitation is $15,000. The health department has been required, in an effort to maintain its service, to dismiss a number of employees and temporarily to detail employees from other services to this work.

Upon inquiry it developed that $200 additional should be provided to take care of employees who would be essential for the remaining days of the fiscal year.

Mr. NORRIS. For the remaining days of this fiscal year ending June 30?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Ending June 30. On the 20th day of June the fund was entirely exhausted, and an investigation disclosed the fact that there would be a little over $100 required, and the committee recommended $200 to provide for every contingency. I reserve the balance of my time and ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. MANN. Oh, just one moment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I might add one thing: I have made some inquiries since the gentleman from Illinois interrogated me, and I am informed that up to the present time about $300 has been expended to pay the mileage of witnesses subpœnaed by the so-called sugar and steel investigation committees. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to hear the gentleman from New York discuss the last item in the bill. I do not know whether he did or not, but I did not hear it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Which item is that—the one respecting the District of Columbia?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I had just completed the explanation of that item and I supposed the gentleman was satisfied.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman has taken his seat away over on the other side of nowhere. No one on this side of the House usually can hear him unless he talks very loud, and he has not been talking very loud to-day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was not the reason the gentleman did not hear me, Mr. Chairman, or that part of my explanation. He was so busily engaged in looking up something on his desk that it escaped his attention that I was explaining that particular feature of the bill. I am willing to give any information the gentleman desires.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. I have not been busy looking up anything except looking up to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I watched some gentlemen sitting further from me on that side of the House than does the gentleman from Illinois, gentlemen who have been solicitous about some of these items, and they seemed to be satisfied with the explanation I was making, and I assumed that the gentleman from Illinois also was satisfied.

Mr. MANN. I am satisfied; if the gentleman made an explanation at all it satisfied me.

Mr. Chairman, the item that has just been discussed for compensation to the clerk at the Speaker's table for preparing a Digest of the Rules for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, $1,000, is somewhat embarrassing to discuss. I have the very highest regard and respect for the gentleman who occupies that position. I believe he is both honest and capable, but this is an unusual appropriation.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is an unusual session.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we have had a number of extra sessions since the gentleman from Georgia and myself have been Members of Congress, but we never have before duplicated this. When the last Speaker, Mr. CANNON, was first elected Speaker of this House I had had something to do with his campaign for that office, and when it was settled that he would be Speaker I went to him and asked him whether he desired to retain as a clerk at the Speaker's table Mr. HINDS, now the gentleman from Maine. Mr. CANNON said to me that he did not see how he could run the office of Speaker properly without the assistance of Mr. HINDS. I said to him that I thought then it would be inevitable that we must increase his salary. When I first came into Congress, I think, if I am not mistaken, the clerk at the Speaker's table, the parliamentary clerk, received a salary of $2,500 a year for being clerk, parliamentary clerk, and also for being clerk to the Committee on Rules. Subsequently it was desired to increase the salary of the Speaker's secretary, and they transferred the clerkship of the Committee on Rules to the Speaker's secretary, and gave him extra compensation for acting as clerk of the Committee on Rules and reduced the salary of the parliamentary clerk to $2,250, and in order to give him the compensation it was thought was necessary provided an extra $1,000 for preparing the Digest.

Mr. GARNER. When was that?

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to anybody.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is not it a fact that up to about eight years ago the Digest was prepared by the Journal clerk? Mr. HINDS has prepared it only for about four Congresses, or eight years, I think. The Journal clerk prepared the Digest until about eight years ago. Is that not a fact?

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. BARTLETT. That the Journal clerk did not prepare the Digest?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I will not say it was not prepared by the Journal clerk, but further back than the gentleman refers it was turned over to the parliamentary clerk, and in the manner in which I have indicated.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not disputing that, but I only ask if it was not a fact that the preparation of the Digest has only devolved upon the parliamentary clerk in the past 10 years?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will not say the exact length of time, because I am not sure about that. I am informed that commenced in the Fifty-sixth Congress, which was considerably more than 10 years ago.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman another question, and then I will not interfere any more. Is it not a fact in these extraordinary sessions, which you and I and the other Members have attended in the Fifty-fifth Congress and since then, we had no preparation of the Digest and Rules until the end of the session or the beginning of the next? In other words, there were no committees appointed and nothing was done with reference to the preparation of this Manual and Digest.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in there about committees I have ever discovered; that is, about the personnel of the committees.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is, the Manual and Digest was not prepared during the extraordinary session until toward the end of the session. Is not that a fact?

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not prepared to say when it was prepared, but I think it has always been prepared at once. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact that in the Sixty-first Congress Mr. HINDS was then acting as clerk to the Speaker and Committee on Rules and received between $5,000 and $6,000 compensation for that year's work?

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not sure about that, but at one time we paid him $20,000.

Mr. GARNER. I understand we paid him $20,000 for a very valuable work, in my estimation, and we got it cheaply; but I want to ask the gentleman if his recollection is not that we paid him compensation at the rate of $3,600 and then $1,000 for making the Digest, and then an additional $1,000, I believe it was, for compensation as clerk to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. MANN. Well, if gentlemen will just control their passions for a moment and let me make a statement I will be greatly obliged to them. Of course I do not mean passions in any invidious sense. As I said originally, the salary was $2,500 to the parliamentary clerk for being the parliamentary clerk and clerk to the Committee on Rules.

A transfer was made, and when Mr. CANNON came in as Speaker I went to the Committee on Appropriations, entirely without any consultation with Mr. HINDS; but knowing that his salary at that time was inadequate and being informed by others that he was contemplating leaving the service, and urged that his salary be increased, which it was to, as I remember, $3,600, where it is now and has been since. The $1,000 extra was to the Speaker's secretary as clerk to the Committee on Rules and not to the parliamentary clerk, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas. The Speaker's secretary remained clerk to the Committee on Rules, receiving an extra $1,000 for the service until the Committee on Rules was divested from the Speaker's office and a new chairman was appointed and a new clerk was provided. But this $1,000 is not for the purpose of making up the Digest. It is for the purpose of giving an excuse for increasing the salary. We do not like to pay large salaries to employees of the House. It was proper that the parliamentary clerk should be paid a considerable salary, but when this was first increased to $3,600, the salary plus $1,000 for the Digest, the reading clerks receiving $3,600 a year, the chief clerk of the Clerk's office receiving $3,600 a year, their salaries being subsequently increased to $4,000 a year, but the $1,000 was a method of increasing the salary. That is all there was to it, a proper method, one that did not make an invidious distinction at the Clerk's desk between the parliamentary clerk and the chief clerk to the Clerk and the reading clerks and the Journal clerk, they having all been about the same salary originally. Now, I have no objection to paying Mr. Crisp $1,000 or $1,500, but let it be plainly understood that it is making him a present of the money, because we are entitled to his services for the salary he receives.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the situation is not this: That the appropriation was made for the fiscal year 1911 and included this $1,000 for the parliamentary clerk, and that $1,000 was drawn by the former occupant of that place, now the gentleman from Maine. Is not that correct?

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Now, then, there was a new Congress. The gentleman is now a Member of this House. We have a new parliamentary clerk. He has been called upon, as I understand it, and ordered by resolution of the House to prepare this Digest, and it has been done. The compensation for that is understood to be $1,000. Now, the compensation will either be paid or not paid. If not paid, then is it not a fact that this work will be done for nothing, excepting his salary?

Mr. MANN. Well, it is not as I understand it at all. Do not let us have any misconception about——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I want to ask further, in order to be understood about it, Is it not a fact that the appropriation is made for the year 1912 and that no matter whether this clerk or some other parliamentary clerk should be there, he would draw that salary? Suppose this parliamentary clerk holds his position only until the 30th of July and another parliamentary clerk takes his place. On account of the position assumed by the gentleman from Illinois would not that mean that this present parliamentary clerk, who did what the House wanted him to do for $1,000, would receive nothing; that Mr. HINDS would have got the $1,000 for 1911 and some one else would get the $1,000 for 1912, but that the one who did the actual work would get nothing?

Mr. MANN. He would get $300 a month.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That is his salary. He would not get the $1,000 additional.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, the $1,000 drawn by the occupant of that position at the last session of Congress was drawn in payment for a definite duty imposed upon him by the House, which was the preparation of a Manual and Digest, and during the 16 years that the occupant of that position was in that office he drew during each Congress $2,000, and for that compensation produced two editions of the Manual and Digest for each Congress.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I was making no strictures on the gentleman from Maine, who was the parliamentarian clerk at the last session.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Maine was probably a little unduly sensitive. No one in this House would intend to reflect upon him [applause], and everyone else would know it except the gentleman from Maine, who may be, as I said, unduly sensitive.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. As a matter of fact, an appropriation was made for that fiscal year. He was in the position, and, drawing that appropriation, he did a definite work. A new Congress comes in. The former parliamentary clerk becomes a Member of Congress. Here the clerk does the actual work—and it is worth it—under the order of Congress, for this $1,000. Now, in order to test the question whether he is entitled to that, if he should cease his employment on the 30th of this month, his successor would draw $1,000 for that particular work for next year. His predecessor drew the $1,000 for this present fiscal year, and the present incumbent would get nothing, notwithstanding the fact that he would have done more work at this session than the other two would have done, because the situation at this session is peculiar and different. I say he ought to get the $1,000 as additional compensation; not as a gift, but as proper compensation for work done at the order of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. Yes. I have something more to say, but I will yield to the gentleman first.

Mr. GARNER. The statement of the gentleman from Illinois is a little inconsistent with the statement of the gentleman from Maine, which is correct. The contention of the gentleman from Illinois is that the $1,000 is purely a matter of additional salary, and not for any work done by the clerk to the Speaker.

Now, the gentleman from Maine has just said that that $1,000 was paid for a specific work. I submit to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] is correct in his statement that that $1,000 was paid for a specific work, and if Mr. Crisp has performed that specific work, he is entitled to the $1,000, and is not subject to the criticism that the gentleman from Illinois has placed upon him.

Mr. MANN. I have not made any criticism. I would be perfectly willing to pay Mr. Crisp $5,000 a year. I think it would have been the height of wisdom if this House had provided a salary of $10,000 a year to Mr. HINDS to remain as parliamentary clerk without regard to politics. I have no objection to that; but I object to the pretense——

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says this is a pretense of doing a special work, and yet that particular special work was created under that side of the House, according to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], and the $1,000 was paid for that specific work.

Mr. MANN. The preparation of the Digest——

Mr. HINDS. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment, I think, perhaps, I can enlighten this subject a little.

Originally, up to the Fifty-fourth Congress, the Manual and Digest was prepared by the Journal clerk of the House, who was the parliamentarian of the House. In the Fifty-fourth Congress there was a change of party, and as sometimes happens in those cases there was an extensive change in the personnel of those about that desk. I myself was appointed clerk to the Speaker's table the very day, I believe, that the new Speaker was elected, and inside of three weeks, I think, I was the senior employee at that desk. The responsibility of the parliamentary work came upon me, but during the Fifty-fourth and the Fifty-fifth Congresses the Manual and Digest still continued to be prepared by the Journal clerk. In the Fifty-sixth Congress, the clerk at the Speaker's table having become in fact the one responsible for the parliamentary procedure at the desk, the Manual and Digest was taken from the Journal clerk and its preparation given to the clerk at the Speaker's table, where from that time it remained.

In the 16 years that I held that position I issued the Manual and Digest a portion of the time, and received compensation for special work for two editions of the Precedents. With the regular salary, which at first was $2,250, with the compensation for the Manual and Digest, and with the extra compensation that was given for preparing the Precedents, and which in one case was a very large compensation, the entire compensation of the clerk at the Speaker's table averaged slightly more than $5,000 per annum during the years in which I held the position.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HINDS. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. During the short session of the last Congress the gentleman acted as clerk at the Speaker's table?

Mr. HINDS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman received $3,600 salary?

Mr. HINDS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. He received the extra compensation of $1,000 for preparing the Manual and Digest?

Mr. HINDS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Now, if his work was worth that amount, and if Mr. Crisp is giving good service, is not Mr. Crisp entitled to $3,600, and to $1,000 also, for his services in this special session from April 4 to July 31?

Mr. HINDS. I dislike to pass upon the compensation of any other man. I would say from my own experience that he would be entitled to the sums which the gentleman mentioned for the first year of the time this Congress lasts. In other words, there never have been more than two Manuals and Digests for a Congress, no matter how many sessions.

Mr. GARNER. Then what becomes of the lapse between March 4 and June 30? Are you going to object to giving him $1,000 for the preparation of this Manual and Digest, when you received an equal amount in addition to the annual salary for the three months of the short session?

Mr. MANN. The same occasion arose at the special session when we passed the Dingley law, and the same occasion arose——

Mr. GARNER. But——

Mr. MANN. Let me make my statement. The gentleman has used most of my time so far. I would like to have a little of it. The same case arose at the special session when we passed the Payne law. We might have dispensed with the service of that parliamentary clerk and got another parliamentary clerk, but having some modicum of common sense, we did not. Do you expect to do that?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but the gentleman must remember one thing, that at the special session he refers to nothing was considered except the tariff bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. We considered as much as we have considered this time—well, considered a great deal more.

Mr. GARNER. Not only that, but the same individual who drew the salary for the fiscal year continued to serve as clerk to the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. Is not the same individual who draws the salary expected to continue during the next fiscal year as the clerk at the Speaker's table?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN. For a short question. I would like to have a little of my time for myself before I get through.

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the gentleman said that the tariff question was well considered at that extra session. I would like to know how well it was considered. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleague from Illinois who has given great consideration to the question of tariff reform gave such careful consideration to it that he recently made a speech on the subject in the House. He gave to the reporters the original notes of his speech from which he read and he was giving careful consideration to the subject of tariff reform. In the course of his speech he read:

Jesus was born in a manger, and John the Baptist fed on locusts and wild honey.

That was followed by "Applause" in the same handwriting that wrote the original paper [laughter], and at the end of his speech, liberally interspersed as it was by the word "Applause" in the same handwriting that wrote the paper from which he read, he provided:

Long and continued applause, followed by handshaking.

Underneath that read the language:

Here insert table of statistics.

Now, it may be that I am mistaken in saying that he gave careful consideration to the tariff question in this speech, because, if I remember rightly, he was giving careful consideration to the admission of two new States to the Union. In that speech he illuminated the subject so thoroughly that he knew in advance just where his side of the House would "applause" and so wrote it in to save the reporters of the House the trouble of doing it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois to be fair with his colleague, as I suppose he wishes to be. Is it not a fact on reading that RECORD that the RECORD does show what actually happened here in the House, and is it not usual that gentlemen of the House here should revise their speeches, and is not that speech revised in the ordinary way? Is it not a fact that the statements were made, that the speech was made, and that the applause was given, and that the handshaking took place just as stated in the RECORD? Does it not show the truth? I ask the gentleman as a witness who was present.

Mr. MANN. No one knows whether it shows the truth or not.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Does it not show it, and does not the gentleman know it does?

Mr. MANN. I do not believe that this House——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Does the gentleman charge that it does not show the fact?

Mr. MANN. I am not making any charges at all.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Why should the gentleman asperse his colleague simply because he is on this side of the House?

Mr. MANN. I am not trying to throw aspersions upon my colleague.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is not the gentleman trying to make it appear in his colleague's district that his colleague fixed the RECORD, and does not the gentleman know the RECORD shows just what took place?

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, I am trying to show just exactly what did take place.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Does not the RECORD show what took place?

Mr. MANN. It does not show what took place.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Wherein does it not show it?

Mr. MANN. I am not on cross-examination.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Oh, I thought the gentleman was testifying. He ought to be fair with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I am fair. It is the gentleman from Texas who lacks that quality.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will certainly never get it by absorption from you.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not think the gentleman could absorb it from anybody. The gentleman, my colleague, read his speech, and, like other speeches that are read from manuscript, it was not taken down by the reporters. The original manuscript was furnished to the reporters and sent to the Printing Office, and we having the right of access to the proof I have examined the proof in the case—the original manuscript—because I questioned whether the House was so far gone that it would greet with applause the statement that Jesus was born in a manger. I did not believe the House would be so sacrilegious, and I investigated and found that all this was written and applause was put in in the original manuscript prepared before the gentleman came into the House, but I did not——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman; certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to deny that statement and brand it as false. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the gentleman is just in the same keeping here to-day as he was on the first day when this Congress met, when he charged gentlemen on this side of the House with being ignorant and impudent because they were new Members. I want to say to him that I have learned since I have been here that there are a few old gentlemen who have served for long years on the floor of this House who are sly, and some who have served longer are devilish sly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have the original manuscript. It is there. Some day, if I can get permission, I will photograph it and put it in the RECORD. It will not do to say that the statement I made is false because it is not so. It is true. There is the paper. Probably the gentleman was not familiar with the fact, but that was an error on the gentleman's part, which doubtless in the course of time——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN (continuing). He will appreciate, and, I trust, the next time will avoid.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if he wants to escape the great responsibility which was thrown upon him as an old Member of the session of Congress which passed the Payne-Aldrich bill by referring to what he calls the weaknesses of new Members who never were here before. I want to ask him if he wants to say to the people of the United States that because a new Member who has come to this House may have made a mistake, that that is the reason for the blunder that that side of the House made in imposing upon the people of this country the infamous tariff bill that was repudiated at the last election and filled your seats here with Democrats pledged to vote in the interests of the people of this country. I want to say to the gentleman that if he continues that conduct here in such high-handedness against the masses of the people that after the next election there will be fewer seats filled by such men as he on the other side of this Chamber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there my colleague gets genuine applause; it may go into the RECORD there.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; but the gentleman did not answer my question.

Mr. MANN. I never when I was a new Member—and I do not think a new Member need to have defense on the floor of the House—I never before discovered a new Member so anxious, or an old Member, in reference to his standing, that he wrote his speech in advance and as he wrote it wrote in the applause where he wanted the applause to be put in it. [Laughter on the Republican side.] And yet, perhaps, that is a wise thing to do, because I have often noticed in the House applause was sometimes indiscriminate. It came in at places where it ought not to appear, and was omitted at places it might properly go in. My colleague was more careful. Having written his speech himself and knowing its merits, he knew where the applause ought to be; and if he had not made the fatal mistake of writing in "applause" after the expression "Jesus was born in a manger" probably no one would have been wiser, and his constituency would have been ready to believe when they read his noble utterances in the speech that he sends out to them how it was received with tremendous applause, that, surrounded by the whole House, he finished this great speech and demolished one bill and milled up another bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, as to the speech to which the gentleman refers, that it is not true that that speech was written as a whole in longhand. I desire to say that that speech was delivered in part, not from the manuscript, but from notes, without any manuscript. And I want to say in reply to the gentleman that that manuscript was taken by the stenographer, that portion of it, after the speech had been delivered, and he himself inserted the marks of applause.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in further reply, that the gentleman has said himself on the floor of this House, repeatedly, that it has been the custom on the floor of this House to revise the speeches that may have been made, and I want to say to him that I have seen in the RECORD, not referring to partisanship at all, speeches that were not delivered on this side or on that side of the House, being speeches which were permitted under the rules to be printed.

And I want to say to the gentleman, in further reply, that the speech which was quoted here as being delivered by me during the debate on the admission of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union was delivered here by me, and the course that was taken was taken because of such gentlemen as he, standing here on the floor of the House and denouncing the common people as being dangerous to civilized government, and saying that power should not be left in their hands to correct the abuses which he and such men as he have imposed upon the people of the United States. That was the cause of a portion of that speech being delivered in the way in which it was delivered. It was to denounce that idea of one-man rule in this country or any other country.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the regret that I have about the matter, and the only real regret that I have—and that is a deep regret—is that the gentleman does not seem to appreciate at all the enormity of his offense.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAGE. Is this discussion in order? Even under the large liberties of general debate in this House, is it in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The House is discussing a bill making a specific appropriation, but a great deal of latitude is allowed. I presume the point of the gentleman from North Carolina is doubtless well taken. I suggest that the gentlemen confine themselves to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Chair will not sustain the point of order. This bill is under debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, other gentlemen may obtain and avail themselves of the same privilege that I have had of examining the copy of the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]——

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague [Mr. STONE]?

Mr. MANN. What is it about? I had about finished my discussion of that phase of the subject.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take part in a controversy that seems to be personal rather than political, but I desire to say that it was my privilege to be in the House when that speech was delivered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], and when the first intimation was made that "applause" was inserted in places where it was not actually given, I examined the speech, and I can give testimony that "applause" was indicated only in the places where it was given.

Peculiar as it may seem to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the sentiment conveyed by the expressions "Jesus was born in a manger" and "John the Baptist lived on locusts and wild honey" was applauded. The applause was not because of the particular quotations, but because the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] reached a climax at that place and because of the context. Humble as my testimony may be, I respectfully submit it to the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's memory must be very good if he is able, after some weeks, to read a speech that is printed in the RECORD and remember in just what places it was applauded in the House.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. He says he examined it soon after.

Mr. MANN. Oh, he did not examine it until the question was raised, and the question was not raised until I referred to the matter in the House some weeks after. But the original manuscript, written in some one's handwriting, along in the same sentence, without missing a space, has in these words "applause" and various other things of that kind as the manuscript was originally prepared. It is nonsense to say that applause happened to come in just at those places. Now, Mr. Chairman, so much for that.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I should like to state that I was in the House when that speech was delivered. I can not say where there was applause or after what utterances, but I do know the speech was applauded a great deal, and there was a considerable amount of applause when it ended. I think this ought to be said in justice to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I do not see what that has got to do with the matter at all.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I thought you were criticising the gentleman for the "applause" in his speech, when the gentleman certainly got a great deal of applause during the delivery of that speech.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in the matter. I was not criticising the gentleman from Illinois at all. I was calling attention to the fact that as originally written, on a brilliant-hued yellow paper, when the gentleman got to a point that he thought was particularly strong he inserted after it the word "applause," or some other word of that kind, long before it had been delivered in the House.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. How does the gentleman know he wrote "applause" on the yellow paper before or after the speech was delivered?

Mr. MANN. I saw the paper and saw him read from it in the House, and the official reporters got the paper from him after he had finished reading it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield to me just a moment?

Mr. MANN. Well, I believe not. I will yield on the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to suggest to the gentleman that this has gone far enough. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I have been trying to close it for some time.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that he was absent from this room at the time when that speech was delivered?

Mr. MANN. It is a fact that I was here part of the time and away part of the time while the gentleman was speaking.

Mr. FOWLER. And I will ask him if it is not a fact that he left this Hall before I began my discourse?

Mr. MANN. Very likely, but I was back here before the gentleman finished talking.

Mr. FOWLER. Was the gentleman here at the close of that speech?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I remember distinctly seeing the gentleman and his bunch of yellow paper. I will not undertake to say that I remember the gentleman's speech, because I do not. It made no impression on me then, and it has made no impression upon me since.

Mr. FOWLER. Then all the gentleman says he knows about it is that there was a manuscript in yellow? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. No; that is not all that I know about it. After all, the principal part of the speech was the yellow paper.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this deficiency bill is for the purpose of providing money to take care of certain contingent expenses of the House. We have heard a great deal about Democratic economy—about how much money the Democrats were going to save in operating this House.

I had supposed that that might be done, at least for a short time. I notice that one of the items in this bill is to purchase 300 new typewriting machines. From my point of view, a proper thing to do, though I wonder how many gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House would vote for it, if it provided for the purchase of 300 typewriting machines, and named them.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my colleague, that they came around and wanted to give me a new typewriting machine, and I said no; that the old one was good enough for me. I did not want to exchange any typewriter.

Mr. MANN. I remember when we first provided for typewriting machines at all. I was the chairman of a special committee in reference to the distribution of room in the Office Building.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. May I ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like somebody to let me get a sentence out before I am interrupted.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I want to understand what the gentleman said. I did not understand him.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will listen, he will understand.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I was listening. What I want to ask the gentleman is this:

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The gentleman asks the question, What one of us would vote for these if the typewriters were named? I do not know whether he meant the name of the kind of a typewriter or the name of the person who got them.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I mean typewriting machines, set out in the bill.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. What kind of a typewriter?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, to make an appropriation for typewriters.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Oh, I understand.

Mr. MANN. The item in the bill is for furniture and materials for repairs of the same, $16,800, and $13,000 is for typewriting machines. I remember when we first provided typewriting machines, and I think we ought to do it. I spoke to some gentlemen on the Democratic side and some on the Republican side, and, as far as I could see, most of them wanted a machine, but nobody wanted to vote for it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I think the gentleman's statement might be construed in a light——

Mr. MANN. Oh, if the gentleman wants to ask me a question, very well. I have occupied only about one-third of my time so far. I prefer to make statements myself.

Mr. GARNER. How many different typewriting machines have been bought since this Congress commenced? I will ask the gentleman that question.

Mr. MANN. I do not know anything about it. There is provision in this item here for 300 typewriting machines.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I prefer to make my statement.

Mr. LLOYD. Let me make this statement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on that side of the House do not seem to apprehend at all that sometimes a gentleman wants to make a statement without being interrupted. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri always; I can not help it.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I just want to state that as far as the Committee on Accounts is concerned and has knowledge, and so far as the present Chief Clerk of the House has knowledge, there has not been a single new typewriter purchased. Every typewriter that has been furnished new has been furnished at the instance of some Member of the House in exchange for an old machine. We have the same number of typewriters now that we had on the 4th day of April last.

Mr. MANN. Well, there is no news in that. If the gentleman had just remained quiet for a moment I would have told him that much myself. That is the trouble. Gentlemen are so touchy over there that they think somebody is assaulting them when you are merely stating a fact. We provided every office over there with a typewriting machine, a very good machine. Some of the gentlemen who have come in here have asked for three changes of typewriting machines since Congress was convened in April or March, whenever it was. They have changed secretaries, and the secretaries wanted different machines. I had wondered whether the gentlemen when they came in, being so economically minded, would dispense with typewriting machines at the expense of the Government. I see that they are not any more disposed to dispense with those things that are convenient for their use than we. You can economize easily enough if you want to. You talk about dispensing with clerks and with other things, but I notice when the time comes you want to get pay for the same things that we wanted to get paid for. You come in with an appropriation bill to provide for the necessary money as a deficiency. Telephones and telegraphs, and so forth—$4,000 is appropriated for Members of Congress sending telegrams at Government expense throughout the country. Maybe we led you into it, I do not know, but after I came here for years I never sent a telegram at Government expense. I think I do occasionally now. How many gentlemen send personal messages at Government expense I do not know.

There is a good chance for some one to investigate. We have got a lot of investigating committees going on at great expense. They might investigate some of those things. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was not able to say how much of this expense was for the special committees, segregating the committees. One committee down here, the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, sent for witnesses a long distance. For what? About expenses in the Interior Department? Not at all; about the policy of our country toward the Indians, a matter that is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs so ably presided over by the gentleman from Texas, but this other committee, without any warrant under the rules, without any jurisdiction to report a bill on the subject of Indian affairs, is discussing what policy the Government should pursue toward the Indians of the country, and we are appropriating money here to pay those witnesses, which, it seems to me, looks extravagant, though I do not wish to criticize my colleague from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] who is chairman of that committee, for whom I have the highest regard and in whom I have great faith. This bill, Mr. Chairman, simply shows that the talk about economy was mainly in the index. I hope that with the assistance or under the leadership of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] when we come to real expenditures in the Government that we will be able to economize. I hope that gentlemen on the Democratic side, who so far have shown no disposition to effect real economy, but only to talk about it, will accept the aid of us on this side even if it be belated and effect real economy in the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further general debate, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The amount authorized to be expended for the employment of personal services under the appropriation in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1911, for the enforcement of certain acts of Congress to prevent the spread of contagious and communicable diseases in the District of Columbia, is hereby increased from $10,000 to $10,200.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"State Department: For subscription of the United States as an adhering member of the International Prison Commission and the expenses of a commissioner, including preparation of report, $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which sum shall remain available during the fiscal year of 1912."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the United States has been an adhering member of the International Prison Commission for a number of years. The year 1910, last year, we had the president of the commission, Dr. Henderson. We made an appropriation of $20,000 to entertain the commission or congress, which, by invitation of the Congress, met in Washington last year. A considerably larger amount was expended, the balance being raised by private contribution. This item was estimated for this year to go in the diplomatic appropriation bill, with a number of other items which were not governed by national treaties, as I understand this is not. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] made a point of order during the consideration of the diplomatic bill against these items, and they all went out. The remainder of them were reinserted in the Senate and were agreed to in conference and went into the law. I understand that this one was left out by inadvertence.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe that the appropriation for this purpose heretofore has not yet been exhausted in any one year. How does it happen this is exhausted in this particular year and a deficit——

Mr. MANN. This is not a deficiency, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, what occasioned the necessity for this extra appropriation?

Mr. MANN. That is certainly a very proper question, and I will explain it in just a moment. As I say, we had the congress here last year by invitation of Congress. We had the president of the association, Dr. Henderson. We have been appropriating for a number of years $2,000, which we put up as our contribution to the association, or congress, or commission, and for some of the expenses incurred by the commissioner. There is no appropriation in the diplomatic bill for the next fiscal year, as I was explaining, for the reason I stated. Our contribution as an adhering member comes due in November, and it would seem that where we have just invited this congress to come to this country and we had the president of the association, we ought not the very next year withdraw from the association, or practically withdraw, by failing to make our contribution.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. What is it?

Mr. MANN. The exact amount of the contribution I do not remember. The total appropriation is $2,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MACON. I would like for the gentleman to tell the committee something of the benefits that accrue to the United States by reason of its membership in this organization.

Mr. MANN. This organization is engaged in the study of prisons and the prevention of crime. It has done a great deal of good work in that direction. I am informed by men in my own city in charge of jails and penitentiaries there and elsewhere in Illinois that there has not been a single agency for the acquisition of knowledge concerning the control of jails and prisons that has done more than this association. When the International Prison Congress was here its delegates visited a number of jails throughout the country and investigated conditions and made suggestions. They have made suggestions also as to the prevention of crime, so as to avoid the necessity of jails and prisons to that extent.

Mr. MACON. From what the gentleman says, I judge that when the association meets the representatives of the different countries give their expert experiences about jails and about how to prevent escapes and how to care for prisoners.

Mr. MANN. Yes. They cover the whole subject of jails and the prevention and cure of crime.

Mr. MACON. How do they go about telling us how to prevent crime. It strikes me that we know better how to prevent crime in this country than they do in many of the countries from whence these delegates come.

Mr. MANN. Well, that may be true; and yet the gentleman from Arkansas, I believe, will agree with me that no one nation knows all about the subject, and by obtaining information from others and passing on to others the information we have, the sum total of information is greatly increased in all nations.

Mr. MACON. I have no doubt but what their suggestions may sometimes be of value.

Mr. MANN. I have not read the report of this last congress, I admit, but a few years ago I did read the reports and furnished a number of copies of the reports to people in my territory who were interested in the subject.

Mr. MACON. We have so many different kinds of international associations that are absolutely worthless, so far as results are concerned, that I am a little skeptical about many of the international associations that Congress is called upon to appropriate for.

Mr. MANN. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Arkansas about a number of these international organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. The main expense incident to this work is not borne by the Governments, or at least by our Government, but is borne by contributions from private individuals who subscribe to the fund. But unless we take part in the organization, particularly in the year after we have entertained the Congress in this country, it seems to me it would be a reflection upon our Government, and I have never looked into a thing that seemed to be more praiseworthy, so far as getting results is concerned, than the expenditure of this sum of money.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman to explain why this was not provided for at the last session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman did not hear my explanation?

Mr. HAMLIN. No; I did not.

Mr. MANN. This matter was estimated for in the last diplomatic and consular bill. There were a number of items in that bill for international conferences, or conventions, that were not provided for by formal treaties confirmed by the Senate. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] made a point of order on the items, and they all went out in the House. The other items were restored in the Senate, but this one was left out.

Now, I have not talked with Mr. HARRISON personally about this, but a gentleman wrote to me from New York that he had talked with Mr. HARRISON and that Mr. HARRISON had no objection to making the appropriation. I do not say that that is correct. His objection at that time was against having the State Department entering independently into agreements.

Mr. HAMLIN. Was this amount appropriated at any time heretofore?

Mr. MANN. It has been appropriated for every year.

Mr. HAMLIN. Can the gentleman tell how much we expended on this particular item last year?

Mr. MANN. I could not say, but I think all has been expended, up to the 1st of July.

Mr. HAMLIN. Has there never been a deficiency?

Mr. MANN. I think not. Most of the money that has been expended by Dr. Henderson is subscribed through some association over in New York.

Mr. AUSTIN. Was not this item recommended by the Attorney General?

Mr. MANN. It was recommended by the Department of State.

Mr. GARNER. And it was reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. MANN. Yes; it was reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am under the impression that it is a worthy object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have a good deal of sympathy with the object, and I think perhaps the appropriation should be made. This bill, however, carries but one item for matters outside of the House of Representatives, and that was considered a matter of the utmost urgency. Other requests for appropriations were made, but the committee believed that under existing conditions they should not be granted. This amendment proposes to appropriate money for a purpose not authorized by law. However meritorious it may be, I should dislike to put myself in a position where the gentleman from Illinois would be continually calling my attention to the fact that in the first bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations to provide deficiencies I acquiesced in an amendment to provide for an appropriation, not for a deficiency but for services in the next fiscal year, not authorized by law.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that if he did it for somebody else, he might do it for me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It seems to me that under all the conditions, and to prevent the gentleman from Illinois calling my attention to that fact hereafter, and in justice to the Committee on Appropriations, having discussed in advance the items that would be considered, and a number of Members having been compelled to leave the city before the bill could be considered, I shall be compelled to insist on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I went before the Committee on Appropriations and made a statement. It is true that it was called to my attention that this is not a deficiency, and I said it was not a deficiency. I think myself the Committee on Appropriations would have been at fault if they had reported this item in the bill; but I do not see that this Committee of the Whole, or the House, will be at fault in adopting an item which everybody concedes to be meritorious, which was inadvertently left out, and which, so far as I can see, there is no other way of providing for.

It is true the Government will continue to exist whether this appropriation is made or not, but in my judgment it will do more good than all the investigations that are now going on, although I hope they will do a great deal of good.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has control of the time.

Mr. HAMLIN. If this amendment does not prevail, does the gentleman not think that, following the practice set by the State Department, this might be paid out of the emergency fund for the Diplomatic and Consular Service?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has investigated that subject and his judgment would be worth a great deal more than mine. I do not know. I understand that this committee have already undertaken to say that a considerable amount shall be paid out of that fund in another direction. Is not that correct?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This committee has not undertaken to say anything of the kind.

Mr. HAMLIN. It ought not to say it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us be on brass tacks about this thing. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from New York contemplates that a certain expenditure shall be paid out of that fund, which at one time the gentleman's committee contemplated bringing before the House?

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no hesitation in making a statement about it.

Mr. MANN. I think there is nothing to hide about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At the request of the President of the United States, through the Secretary of the Navy, the Committee on Appropriations considered the subject of making an appropriation for the purpose of entertaining a distinguished foreign representative who is to come to the United States. At that time it was thought that there was no appropriation available from which such an expenditure could be made. Not wishing to assume authority to answer the question one way or the other, I conferred with some Members on this side of the House, and I conferred with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and then the Committee on Appropriations informally discussed the matter, and it was believed that if it were necessary to make such an appropriation the committee would recommend it to the House, because of the importance of the matter from the standpoint of our relations with other nations.

Mr. HAMLIN. But the gentleman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, before the matter was taken up formally, however, I conferred with the Secretary of State to inquire whether there was not an appropriation which was available for the purpose; and after a very frank conference with the Secretary of State, it was apparent that there was a fund which properly could be devoted to this purpose and that there was ample money in that fund for the purpose. Under the circumstances, the Committee on Appropriations refrained from going further.

It has been the practice for years to entertain foreign dignitaries who visit this country and to pay for that entertainment from the emergency fund, and in my opinion there is no question that such proper expenditures are proper from that fund. There were but two instances that could be found where there has been a specific appropriation made for such a purpose.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MACON. For the purpose of allowing me to suggest that in case he attempts to bring in an appropriation of that character he would have an objection to go up against. I hope he will find a way out of it without bringing it before the House, because I certainly would have to object to frittering away the people's money in entertaining people of the character the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course I do not know what the gentleman has in mind. If, in my opinion, the relations of the United States with some other power were such that some representative of that Government were coming here, and it was the duty of the United States to extend the ordinary courtesies that should be extended to the representatives of foreign powers when visiting this country, I would not hesitate not only to recommend but to vote and advocate an appropriation that would enable the United States to do the decent thing in its relations with the nations of the world. [Applause.]. Whether the Members consider that frittering away money or not would not affect me. There are certain relations which exist in the households of every Member and which require the expenditure of money in the entertainment of visitors. There are also certain relations of the same character which would require on the part of nations expenditures of a similar character.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the gentleman would select his company. We usually do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there might be a difference of opinion among Members of the House or among gentlemen as to one person or another, but I hope that nobody will say anything that might be construed or might give rise to the belief that somebody entertains a belief that the representative of any foreign nation which had diplomatic relations with the United States would not receive proper hospitality from the Government of the United States when coming here as representative of another great nation of the world.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman allow me to proceed further? Would the gentleman be willing to appropriate the money of the people to entertain any kind of a subject who might come here from any kind of a foreign nation just because he came as the representative of that particular nation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If any nation which has diplomatic relations with the United States should select some individual as its representative, and he were to visit this country in an official capacity as the representative of that nation, I do not believe that I would be justified in inquiring as to whether that Government had selected some one who would be particularly pleasing to me. We can not, any more than other nations could with us, pass upon the personality of the individual selected.

Mr. MACON. But we have the right, when we come to deal socially with other nations, to treat them just as we would our neighbors in matters of social equality.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. MACON. We could not afford to allow our neighbors to associate with us indiscriminately on terms of equality, could we?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are obligations resting upon us as a Nation that makes it impossible to exercise the same choice that we would as individuals.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I agree in part with the gentleman and would vote with him to appropriate any reasonable amount of money to entertain any distinguished visitor from a foreign country to our country, but I do not agree with him by any manner of means if he concludes that any part of the so-called emergency fund shall be used for that purpose without an express direction by Congress.

I have gone into this matter far enough to know that fund which is expressly appropriated for foreign intercourse and the promulgation of treaties with foreign nations has been shamefully abused—thousands and thousands of dollars of the people's money expended for which no accounting has been made to Congress and none can be made under the law. Now, I can see that a special case may be found where it could be construed to be in the interest of foreign intercourse to entertain a certain distinguished visitor to this country, but if that be true, that expense ought to be specifically appropriated for by this House, so that Congress could know how much was expended for that purpose, and not give to any man, I care not who he is, the right to pay out of this fund such sum as he may choose, because if we once begin these things we know by experience there will nothing stop it but a complete exhaustion of the fund.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fund is not a very large one.

Mr. HAMLIN. Ninety thousand dollars per year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not all expended every year.

Mr. HAMLIN. Practically.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HAMLIN. Practically.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; there usually are ten or fifteen thousand dollars unexpended.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, that is very little as compared with the total amount appropriated.

I do not believe these dinners and other forms of entertainment can legally be paid out of the so-called emergency fund, and I want to enter my protest against that idea now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If Congress were to make specific appropriations in each instance when some representatives from other nations came here, and if Congress would determine to appropriate a certain sum for the entertainment of a distinguished personage from one power, and some time afterwards a representative of another nation came and for many reasons a different program were arranged and a different sum was appropriated, it would result in an invidious comparison, which would be more embarrassing than to permit some official in his discretion to expend what would be a reasonable sum in each instance.

Mr. HAMLIN. It has already developed, however, that there have been——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will not interject here other matters relative to the emergency fund.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to make a point of order that, proceeding under the five-minute rule, this discussion is not germane to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce to the gentleman from New York that the Chair understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] rose to discuss the point of order made by him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I concede this discussion is not in order at this time, but I was simply answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. I shall be compelled to insist upon the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not withdraw it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I admit that it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUCKER of Missouri, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the year 1911, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GERTRUDE M. HUBBARD.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 6733) to accept and fund the bequest of Gertrude M. Hubbard, on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, be recommitted to the Committee on the Library, and I will state that the reason for it is that another bill of the same nature, in consonance with the recommendations from the Treasury Department and covering the same subject, was later introduced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the bill H. R. 6733 be recommitted to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MANN. That is the bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is on the Union Calendar. It was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, but was objected to on the 19th.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

INFORMATION FROM SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report (No. 56) from the Committee on Territories on a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for information.

The SPEAKER. For consideration now?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on the Territories, submits the following privileged resolution and report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 218).

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the House of Representatives the following:

A copy of all bids, affidavits, documents, letters, contracts, receipts, and all and every kind of information in his possession or under his control, whether in the office of the Quartemaster General or other bureau, and of whatsoever kind or whence derived, relating to those certain matters and things charged and contained in that certain affidavit signed by H. J. Douglas and sworn to on the 23d day of May, 1910, before Benjamin Vail, notary public in and for the District of Columbia, a copy of which was forwarded to the Secretary of War on the 24th day of May, 1910, by the Delegate from Alaska, the receipt of which was not acknowledged by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the resolution being privileged.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on it?

Mr. MANN. I may not desire to make the point of order, although I think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it is simply a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for certain papers which were sent to him with the affidavit of H. J. Douglas in reference to the purchase of coal for the military posts in Alaska. This information was put in the shape of affidavits more than a year ago and sent to the Secretary of War, charging that there was a collusion between the coal dealers there, in violation of law, and this resolution simply calls upon the Secretary of War for these papers and these affidavits.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman given this matter some attention, so that he knows what the situation is?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think so.

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I just noticed the resolution. Of course somebody might be calling for papers for the purpose of making them public when it was desirable not to make them public, in the interest of prosecutions or something of that kind.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No. It is nothing of that kind. The information was lodged with the Secretary of War and also with the Attorney General. No action was taken, and the statute of limitations bars prosecutions now. The purpose is to get information as to why the matter was allowed to die.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alaska introduced two resolutions?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. One in reference to the Secretary of War and one in reference to the Attorney General. Does the gentleman report both?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No. The resolution in reference to the Attorney General went to the Committee on the Judiciary, and this one in reference to the Secretary of War went to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. MANN. Both resolutions desired to get the same information?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; not exactly the same information.

Mr. MANN. There would be no object in passing both resolutions, would there be?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; there will be. The one calling on the Attorney General for information is in reference to other matters. It is not exactly like this one.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Speaker, although I think the resolution is subject to a point of order. The statement of fact at the end of the resolutions may or may not be true——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. What is the statement of fact at the end of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. The statement of fact is that the receipt of the document was not acknowledged. Whether it was or not does not make any difference.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that this resolution was amended by the committee so as to strike out that statement of fact.

Mr. MANN. The amendment was not reported, was it?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on the Territories, submitted the following report:

"The Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 218) calling on the Secretary of War for information, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House with an amendment, in line 15, after the word 'Alaska,' to strike out the comma and all words following thereafter and insert in lieu thereof a period, and recommend that the resolution as amended be adopted."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The amendment has not been reported yet.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The amendment is the striking out of the words that the gentleman alluded to. Let the Clerk read the amendment, and then the gentleman will see from the report what the amendment is.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15, after the word "Alaska," strike out the comma and all words following thereafter and insert in lieu thereof a period.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn over until next Thursday, June 29.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Will we have some understanding that there will be no business transacted on Thursday in the House?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I understand that there is nothing on the program for Thursday—nothing that we expected to do.

Mr. MANN. I wondered if we could reach some understanding with the gentlemen on the other side?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The situation is such that I doubt if we could undertake anything on next Thursday without having an understanding. There will be no attempt to take up any business on Thursday, so far as I know.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that he state to the gentleman from Illinois that there will not be any business transacted on Thursday.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will say, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Illinois that there will be no business on Thursday.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will not make any such promise as that, because I think he might be overstating the situation. There is a probability that there will be some matters brought up next Thursday that might require the attention of the House.

Mr. MANN. What are they? I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I think the general understanding has been that there would not be much business transacted until after the Fourth of July. It is perfectly patent that any gentleman who is here can stop the transaction of reading the Journal by making the point of no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will except this little bill, which may come back here with some slight amendments that ought to be considered.

Mr. MANN. It can wait. It has waited a long time now. It will not hurt it to wait a few days longer. I will say to the gentleman that if I am here there will be no business transacted, and if I am not here I am going to ask some other gentleman, if I can find him, who will be here to see that no business is transacted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a matter which does not concern me.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me it would be better to have an understanding that we may adjourn over until Thursday, and then, without any business being transacted, adjourn over from Thursday until Monday, which will be committee-discharge day, and without any business being transacted adjourn on that day until after the Fourth of July. What day is Fourth of July?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Tuesday.

Mr. MANN. That we adjourn at least until after the Fourth.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. There will be no trouble about that. I say that to the gentleman advisedly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LAWS RELATING TO THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 191), which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of Public Law No. 475, Sixty-first Congress, third session, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," be printed for the use of the House document room.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report (H. Rept. 57).

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 191) providing for the printing of 5,000 copies of Public Law No. 475, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to. There have been printed for the House document room 20,000 copies of this law and the supply is now exhausted. It is a very important document, for which there is constant demand, and the committee recommends that these additional copies be printed.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I notice the gentleman proposes to distribute these documents through the document room. Why not have them distributed through the folding room?

Mr. FINLEY. I really have no objection; but this is the usual procedure.

Mr. GARNER. Is it the usual procedure to send these things to the document room?

Mr. FINLEY. That is where they have been going.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is my understanding that there are demands coming in from all over the country for this document.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARNER. Why do not you provide——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Either to the gentleman from Texas or the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should yield to one or the other.

Mr. FINLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Why does not the gentleman provide that 500 or 1,000 copies go to the document room and the balance to the folding room, to the credit of Members?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will say that if the House has any preference at all to have them go to the folding room, I have no objection.

Mr. GARNER. If you send them to the document room, one Congressman can go and get a couple of thousand and send them all out.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas offer any amendment?

Mr. MANN. Well, you can not amend it to-day. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, formerly when these laws run out in the document room, the document room ordered an additional quota, but under a recent ruling of the Committee on Printing that can not be done.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that the law is, and that has not been interfered with by the Joint Committee on Printing, that when a document or a public law in the Senate document room or the House document room is exhausted, the Clerk of the House, in case of a House document, or the Secretary of the Senate, if it is a Senate document, may order 1,000 copies, provided the document does not exceed 50 pages, but neither the Secretary of the Senate nor the Clerk of the House can order exceeding 1,000 copies under the statute. That is the law. There is no ruling by the joint committee at all.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, the ruling is, as I understand it, that heretofore 1,000 copies could be ordered at a time. Now, the committee ruled that only 1,000 copies can be ordered in toto, which, by the way, is in complete contradiction of the statement made on the floor of the House when that law was passed.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the gentleman is entirely mistaken, because the joint committee has made no such ruling. On the contrary, they have ruled the other way, that whenever the Clerk of the House certifies that a particular document which he has the right under the statute to have reprinted is exhausted, then he may order 1,000 additional copies, and when that thousand is exhausted he may order an additional thousand. I will say to the gentleman that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MANN. I hope that I am.

Mr. FINLEY. I know that the gentleman is.

Mr. MANN. I get my information from the Clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing and from the document room.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I am a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, and that the matter was thrashed out there, and I know whereof I speak.

Mr. MANN. I am very glad to hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say further to the gentleman that all that the Joint Committee on Printing is doing is to do the very best we can to carry out the law. That is what we are doing, and what we are doing to-day, so that the ruling the gentleman speaks of has never been made by the committee in my time.

Mr. MANN. And the reason for this resolution is because of the size of the document?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes and no; the document costs $153.86, but the other end of the Capitol——

Mr. MANN. And what is the reason for passing the resolution?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that the Senate membership of the Joint Committee on Printing did not care to O. K. the order——

Mr. MANN. If the document room can order 1,000 copies to-day and, if they run out, order another thousand to-morrow, what is the object of passing the resolution for 5,000 copies?

Mr. FINLEY. The information we have leads us to believe that 5,000 copies are necessary to fill the demand from Members of the House. The resolution was introduced by myself, and we think this is the proper way to comply with the demand in the House, that the Clerk can not give the order for the reason that the document exceeds 50 pages.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to raise any question about it, but I want to call the attention of the gentleman to one thing, and also the attention of the Members of the House. Everywhere this refers to public law number so-and-so. That means nothing.

Mr. FINLEY. This resolution gives the title.

Mr. MANN. In the report it says public law so-and-so. There is no such public law at this session of Congress. There may have been a dozen public laws with that number in previous Congresses.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that the resolution itself gives the title of the public law.

Mr. MANN. Well, it ought to be referred to by title and not by number, because the numbers change with every Congress.

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman does not think that I am mistaken about that, because he knows that public laws commence with No. 1 with every Congress and run through to the end of the Congress, public and private laws together.

Mr. FINLEY. Well, it is well known what this refers to. This is a public law of the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, June 29, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

TUESDAY, June 27, 1911.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice at this time that on Thursday morning, immediately after the routine morning business, if convenient to the Senate, I will submit some observations on House bill 4412, known as the Canadian reciprocity bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of sundry citizens of Iowa, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KERN presented resolutions adopted by the Carmel Quarterly Meeting of Friends' Church, held at Noblesville, Ind., favoring the adoption of international arbitration and universal peace, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHIVELY presented resolutions adopted by the Carmel Quarterly Meeting of Friends' Church, held at Noblesville, Ind., favoring the adoption of international arbitration and universal peace, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BAILEY presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Valley View, Tex., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday-rest bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to present the following order for the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to submit the following order.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, July 24, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on that day, without further debate, a vote shall be taken in the Senate upon all amendments then pending or to be offered, and that the amendments agreed to shall be considered engrossed, the bill read the third time, and the vote shall then be upon the final passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. HEYBURN, and Mr. BRISTOW addressed the Chair.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have the whole order read first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the rest of the order.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Wednesday, July 26, 1911, following the routine morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on that day, without further debate, a vote shall be taken in the Senate upon all amendments then pending or to be offered, and that the amendments agreed to shall be considered engrossed, the bill read a third time, and the vote shall then be upon the final passage of the bill.

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Thursday, July 27, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on that day, without further debate, a vote shall be taken in the Senate upon all amendments then pending or to be offered, and that the amendments agreed to shall be considered engrossed, the bill read the third time, and the vote shall then be upon the final passage of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think that debate had better proceed on the so-called reciprocity bill. It is possible that by July 24 Senators will have been fully heard, and that a vote may be taken at that time upon the bill. Possibly a vote may be reached sooner than July 24; I do not know about that. I am unwilling, so far as I am concerned, that a time shall be fixed for a vote until that bill has been fully debated, until it shall have been shown to the country just what its true character is, and until all the amendments which are offered or to be offered shall have been fully discussed.

For that reason, Mr. President, I must interpose an objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's objection goes to all three orders? They are presented as separate orders. The Chair simply wishes to know; that is all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I directed my remarks especially to the reciprocity bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator's observation was directed to one special bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I object to fixing a time on which a vote shall be taken on that bill; at least, I object to the fixing of the time now, until debate shall have proceeded further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin objects to the entry of the first order. Is there objection——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to hear some——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, an explanation. I rose—and the RECORD will, perhaps, show that I did—after the reading of the first order. I do not want to have it inferred from what the RECORD may show that I rose to object. I rose to ask for the reading of the other two orders.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the entry of the second or third order?

Mr. NELSON, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. BRISTOW addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota first rose. The Chair will then recognize the Senator from Texas.

Mr. NELSON. I feel like objecting, but I will suggest to the chairman of the committee that we take the vote first on the farmers' free-list bill, then on the wool bill, and then, about two weeks after that time, that we take the vote on the reciprocity bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, before any agreement can be made about this matter I think the Senate is entitled to know as much about it as the Senator from Pennsylvania knows; and if it is parliamentary for me to do so, I should like for him to advise the Senate whether or not, in his opinion, the President intends to veto the free-list bill and the woolen bill. As the spokesman of the administration, or one of them, he ought to be able to inform the Senate on that subject.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I would have no right to state if I knew, but as a matter of fact I have no knowledge as to what the action of the President would be upon these measures. Last week the Senate took the unprecedented course of instructing the Finance Committee to report the wool bill within 20 days. Being deeply impressed with the vigor of the majority and desiring to get in harmony with the wishes of the majority, I am endeavoring to cooperate to have speedy action on all these measures. The committee concluded that it was impossible to grant this indecent treatment to the hundreds of persons who had filed formal applications for a hearing before the committee, and therefore resolved that it would be idle to attempt hearings, and the bills were reported out the following morning for the consideration of the Senate.

Now, I want to expedite the public business. I believe that the country is looking to the Senate for performance of some kind. If it is the will of the majority of the Senate that the so-called free-list bill and the wool bill should be enacted into law, I will again abide by the decision of the majority. If the President in his wisdom shall see fit to sign them, I will endeavor to pursue the even tenor of my way under them as laws. But I do not see any use during midsummer in an indefinite delay.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the readiness with which the Senator from Pennsylvania acquiesces in the decision of the Senate excites my suspicion. I am very free to say that I have learned to regard him as a pretty stubborn sort of a fighter, and I am compelled to think that the Senator from Pennsylvania now calculates that if these bills are passed separately, because evidently it is the program to vote on one and then on the other and then on the third, the President will approve the reciprocity bill, about which he seems to be so deeply concerned, and will veto the other two bills which have come to us from the House.

In his message to the House only a few days ago the President declared that there ought not to be any tariff legislation until the Tariff Board reports, and the newspapers indicate that the President has communicated to his friends in the Senate a statement that he will veto the reciprocity bill if any amendment is attached to it.

It is inconceivable to me that the President of the United States would veto a bill which he desires simply because there was attached to it another bill unless he intended to veto that other bill if presented to him as a separate proposition. It looks to me like we are invited to a feast and we are to be made to entertain ourselves at the second table.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that there is nothing in the suggested order which will prevent any number of tariff amendments being inserted on the reciprocity bill, should the majority of the Senate so determine. As to the President's approval or disapproval of the bill, I can not see that it makes any difference to the Senator from Texas or any other Senator whether that fatal act occurs in midsummer or later in the fall.

Mr. BAILEY. But if it is bad, the longer it is postponed the better, I suppose; but the time does not interest me. It is the fact I want.

Here, Mr. President, is my situation—and we might as well be frank with each other about it: I know that we have no chance to pass either the free-list bill or the woolen bill except with the aid of certain Republicans. It happens that nearly all of the Republicans who are ready to assist us in passing those bills are all opposed to this reciprocity bill.

For one time in my life I find myself in accord from top to bottom with the Republican insurgents on this reciprocity bill and upon practically every aspect of it. The truth of it is, I am rather inclined to think that they would feel at liberty to invite me to their caucus if they held one on that, and I am inclined to think I would feel more at home with them on that question than with anybody else in the Senate; and I intend to act in good faith with them because I know we have no hope of passing either the free-list bill or the woolen bill without their assistance.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. In one moment. So far as I am personally concerned—and on this question I speak and act only for myself, of course—I do not intend to assent to any arrangement that will enable the Democrats who are in favor of reciprocity to join with the stalwarts and get this reciprocity bill through the Senate, which the President will approve, and then leave us to rely on the Republican insurgents to help us pass the other bills to encounter a presidential veto. We have the power now to send all three of those bills to the President and compel him to take all of them or none of them, sir, and it will be a strange attitude for the Democratic Party if it allows itself to be so placed that it is more anxious to pass a Republican President's reciprocity bill than it is the Democratic House free-list and wool bill. Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas by what authority he makes the statement that the insurgents who will support the free-list bill and the woolen-schedule bill are all opposed to the reciprocity bill?

Mr. BAILEY. I hardly stated it in that form. If I did, I did not accurately state what was in my mind. I said our only hope of passing these bills is through the votes of certain Republicans who are opposed to the reciprocity bill. I do not understand that all the insurgents, actual and near insurgents, are opposed to the reciprocity bill, but my understanding is that substantially all of them are.

Mr. WORKS. I just wanted to say that I suppose I am classed as an insurgent, and——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator's name stands pretty high on that list, I think.

Mr. WORKS. I merely wish to say that the Senator from Texas has no authority to make that statement so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, while I am in agreement, I am glad to say, with the insurgents now, I am not assuming any authority to speak for any of them. They have a habit of speaking for themselves, and speaking plainly and speaking well. I am in such an attitude about the reciprocity bill that I am not even permitted to speak for a fraction of the Democrats. I am rather inclined to think that I am almost alone over here, but I want to say there will be many Democrats who will regret they did not join me if it transpires that the President gets the corn and the Democratic Party gets the husk, which it will get even if it does not get the free-list bill and the woolen schedule enacted into law.

Mr. President, I want to go one step further and say, if we were to send the Canadian reciprocity bill amended by the free-list bill and a woolen bill—because, frankly, sir, I do not expect we shall pass the woolen bill as it came from the other House, though I would like to see that done—I perfectly understand that those Republicans, sometimes called insurgents and sometimes called progressives, do not agree with us; they do not favor as low a revision as we do, and yet they desire very much lower than the existing duties, and they probably will not vote for the bill as it comes from the other House even with the amendments which, on my own behalf and on my own responsibility, I shall offer. I expect to be compelled, finally, to vote for their bill, and I shall do that cheerfully if they offer a better bill than the existing law, and it could hardly be possible that they would offer a worse one; but, sir, if the President of the United States, presented with these three measures combined in one, should veto the entire bill, he would be at such a disadvantage in the presidential contest as would almost relieve that struggle from its anxiety and its doubt.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. One moment. The President himself has declared that the woolen schedule is not defensible. He has declared repeatedly that Canadian reciprocity is a triumph of diplomacy and of statesmanship. He has deemed it of such magnitude and of such importance that he has not only traversed the country campaigning in its behalf, but he convened the Congress of the United States in extraordinary session to pass it; and yet with a woolen bill that meets his criticism against the existing woolen schedule, with a reciprocity bill that he proclaims as his very own, there would be nothing left but the small, insignificant free list to justify the interposition of a veto. I do not believe he would veto all of them; and yet as certain as we send in this reciprocity bill alone and afterwards send him the other bills, just so certain, in my opinion, the other two will incur the presidential veto.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas says that the President would be in a bad situation politically if he should veto the reciprocity bill amended by the wool-schedule bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I ought to have said I thought he would be in a worse situation. I think he is in a bad situation now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not dispute that proposition with the Senator—but what I wanted to ask the Senator was this—since the Senator is considering the political effect of the President's veto—if, after having made a campaign for the Presidency upon the platform of tariff revision, this reciprocity bill should pass Congress and then we should pass reasonable reductions of other schedules of the tariff, and they should be submitted to the President, if he is to be actuated by the political effect, would he veto, could he afford to veto, a revision of the wool schedule and a reasonable reduction of other schedules of the tariff separate and apart from the reciprocity bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I hope unanimous consent will be given to vote on these two bills according to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. DIXON. On which two bills?

Mr. HEYBURN. On the free list and the wool bills.

Mr. BAILEY. I can satisfy the Senator from Montana, I believe, if he will go into executive session with me, that this is the wisest thing for us to do. I will assume that responsibility, if the Senator will not object.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I will have to have some further light upon this subject at this time.

Mr. BAILEY. I will try to give it to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I will clear this situation, then, as I do not know what information the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the entry of the second order.

Mr. BAILEY. That will give me time to hold a session with the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. I think I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has objected. That ends that proposition. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I wanted to state why I could not consent to the proposed order, at this time at least. It is perfectly evident, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has just said, that the program which has apparently been adopted by the Democratic Senators certainly will result, if carried to a final conclusion, in the passage of the reciprocity bill and the veto of any bills looking to general tariff revision. That is the inevitable result of the present situation, and the Senators on the other side of the Chamber might as well accept it.

I personally have no reason to attempt to hold the Senate in protracted session, but the chairman of the Finance Committee, with his wide experience in legislation and his wisdom, certainly must know that no popgun bill for the revision of the tariff can become a law; and that the debate and the amendments of the wool schedule, whether any more schedules come over from the other House or not, will have to embrace every phase of tariff legislation before this session adjourns. There is no secret about that matter. The Republican Senators, especially those from the Northwest, I think have made it plain that if this new propaganda of free trade in agricultural products, under the guise of Canadian reciprocity, avowedly for the benefit of the great manufacturing centers of the East and for the millers and the border railroads, is to become the policy of the Republican Party, then we have got to reedit our old textbooks on political economy.

The Senator from Texas was a little bit loose in his language this morning in referring to Republican Senators on this side of the Chamber who are opposed to reciprocity as insurgents. A majority of Republican Senators here——

Mr. BAILEY. Allow me to correct the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I may have been loose in my language, because I came into the Senate while this matter was in progress, and I was trying to reason out in my mind the situation while I was talking, and, when I finally reasoned it out, the Senator from Montana was not amenable to my suggestion; but I want to say that I do not mean that all the Republicans who are opposed to reciprocity are insurgents, nor do I mean that all the Republicans who are insurgents are opposed to reciprocity, but still my statement stands that the Democrats have no earthly hope of passing any of these tariff-revision bills except with the aid of Republicans who are opposed to reciprocity.

Mr. DIXON. But what I mean, Mr. President, in adverting to the looseness of expression of the Senator from Texas in referring to the Republican Senators who are opposed to reciprocity as being insurgents is this: The term "insurgent," as I understand its meaning, applies to a minority of a certain political party. I think there are about 30 Republican Senators on this side of the Chamber opposed to reciprocity; certainly more than a majority of the Republican Senators in this Chamber are opposed to it, unless it carries with it as a coordinate scheme the general lowering of tariff duties in this country. The Republican Senators who are supporting reciprocity, with the aid of practically the solid Democratic vote, are now the insurgents of the Republican Party. It is the minority section of Republican Senators, led by intrepid and gallant warriors from certain States in New England and from New York and Pennsylvania, who have absorbed the term that was formerly applied to a minority of Republican Senators in this body.

If the Democratic membership of the Senate really want tariff revision and are not simply posing and attempting to play politics for the next presidential campaign, I want to say to them that so soon as Republican Senators are convinced that reciprocity is going to become a law there are plenty of votes, and to spare, on this side of the Chamber added to the Democratic vote to pass as an amendment to the reciprocity bill, as a correlated subject, a general tariff-revision scheme, and there will be no doubt about the brand it will carry when it comes to a final vote in the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Montana—and I speak for myself alone, but I believe that my views will be concurred in by every Senator on this side—that if the Senator from Montana, or any other Senator on the other side who is cooperating with him, will say to this side, speaking ex cathedra, that the President of the United States will approve the reciprocity measure if amended and as amended, I believe that every Senator on this side is willing to go farther than those who go farthest on the other side in favor of attaching a general tariff revision to the reciprocity bill.

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I can not guarantee what the President of the United States may or may not do, but the policy that is now being pursued by a majority of the Democratic Senators inevitably leads to free trade in farm products and the maintenance of high protective tariff duties on manufactured articles. There is no escaping that conclusion, as the Senator from Texas has well demonstrated this morning. You are accentuating by your own act the differences heretofore complained of in protective tariff duties. It may be good politics, but it does not lead to the result that the Senator from Oklahoma has contended for ever since he has been in the Senate.

If we are to have reciprocity, if we are to have free trade in all farm products, there is an abundance of votes on this side of the Chamber to unite with you in a general tariff revision as an amendment to the reciprocity bill, so that reciprocity and general tariff revision may carry through as one comprehensive scheme.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator from Montana, simply as one honest man speaking to another, this question——

Mr. DIXON. I will meet the Senator half way on that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whether he does not know that the result of that maneuver would be to kill both propositions, and whether that is not his intent?

Mr. DIXON. I answer the Senator from Mississippi frankly, that is not my intent; but I do not believe——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would it not, in the Senator's opinion, be the plain, palpable, and obvious result?

Mr. DIXON. I do not believe it would.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator believes that the President of the United States, then, in spite of his public utterances——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana has yielded to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Senator from Montana has yielded to the Senator from Mississippi for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Montana believes, then, that the President of the United States, in spite of his public utterances, would sign a bill which was a general revision of the tariff?

Mr. DIXON. I do not see how he could refuse to sign it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator does not see how a protectionist President could refuse to sign a bill that Democrats and tariff revisionists, meaning by that revisionists downward, would send to him, a bill expressing their views, and the Senator is willing to say to the Senate and to the country that he believes a protectionist President would sign such a bill?

Mr. DIXON. I am not authorized to speak for the President in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not saying that. I am asking you about your own belief, not about any question of authority.

Mr. DIXON. I believe he would sign it; yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator believes he would sign it?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I thought that, I would be happy.

Mr. BAILEY. If we vote for his bill, he might sign our bills.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. DIXON. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi, with the permission of the Senator from Montana, by what authority he intimates that the President will not sign the other bills referred to while he will sign the reciprocity bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the authority of common sense, by the authority of ordinary observation, by the authority of historical information, by the authority that leads me to believe that if I get on a street car out there going in a certain direction and keep on it I will land at the terminus.

Mr. NELSON. What is the object, then, in attempting to pass these other bills when you expect that they will inevitably receive the presidential veto? Is it for politics you are moving?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We are not expecting to attempt to pass a general tariff bill. It would be madness. The Democratic House has not undertaken that. Upon the contrary, they have undertaken to revise the tariff downward as well as they may by special schedules, hoping that some of those schedules would meet the support of the Senate of the United States, although nominally Republican, and might meet with the approval of the President of the United States. For example, I believe that a reasonable revision of the woolen schedule, as an original measure, ought to pass this House after reciprocity is out of the way; and I believe that, if Senators on the other side are consistent with their past records, enough of them will vote for it to pass it; and I believe that, in view of his past utterances concerning Schedule K, the President himself, who said that that schedule was indefensible, would be forced either to stultify himself grossly or to sign it. I believe there are several schedules which we might be able to put through in that way.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not believe, and I started to say I did not believe that anybody believed, but I will not say that, because I have had the assurance from one Senator that he does believe, that the President of the United States would sign a general tariff bill. Nor do I believe that enough votes for a general tariff bill could be obtained upon the other side of the Chamber to send it to the President except as an amendment to the Canadian reciprocity bill with the purpose and with the intent of killing the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana surrender the floor?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, after this very interesting episode I should like, if possible, to propose an agreement to the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Finance Committee. I take it for granted that he did not expect these orders, or either of them, would receive the assent of the Senate.

I noticed in this morning's paper—I observe in passing that I am sorry to see that my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, is falling into the habit of being interviewed—that these orders were to be proposed this morning in order to fasten the responsbility for a continuance of this session upon certain Senators.

I for one am perfectly willing to bear my share of the responsibility of continuing this session until we have debated every material and pertinent phase that arises out of the propositions now before the Senate. I assume that we all understand that no time can be fixed for voting upon the proposed reciprocal measure until there has been such a discussion of it as will enable us to predict with reasonable certainty what further time may be required for its consideration.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he will not agree to present these orders once each day, at a specified time, so that we may be prepared for them, and not anticipate that they may come in at any hour of the session. Will he not agree that in every morning hour they shall be presented, in order to fasten the responsibility upon certain recalcitrant Senators?

Mr. PENROSE. I had not intended to offer these orders every day, but if the Senator from Iowa desires me to do so, I shall be glad to offer them as nearly as I can every day before the close of the morning business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood from the interview that I read that they were to be presented day after day. I do not know that that was a correct or veracious interview.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not give any interview, Mr. President. It is impossible to prevent the quoting in an incorrect way of casual conversations in these transactions. I talked to a number of Senators yesterday afternoon on this subject, the Senator from Iowa being among them, and I supposed what 10 or 15 Senators know about is difficult of suppression or concealment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, absolutely no suggestion of suppression or concealment. Otherwise the Senator from Pennsylvania would not have advertised it in the newspapers.

Mr. PENROSE. My talk was not of a confidential nature, and I did not care whether it was published in the newspapers or not. My intention has been to do all I can to expedite voting on these measures. I have endeavored to treat them with absolute impartiality. These orders take the bills in the order of their reception by the Senate. I have requested the Senate to give unanimous consent to their adoption regardless of the fact whether I personally favor these measures or am opposed to them. I have endeavored to carry out the will of the Senate as expressed last week when it declared by a decisive majority that the Finance Committee should have 20 days to consider these two tariff bills, and I have asked 30 days to consider them, to wind them up, to dispose of them, to allow the business interests of the country to be at rest and know where they are, and let us adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask another question of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The great matter of doubt in the Senate seems to be with respect to the attitude of the President of the United States toward bills that may be passed revising a few of the prominent and especially burdensome schedules of the tariff. If it were known positively what the President would do respecting those matters I think there would be an instant clarification of the atmosphere in the Senate, and we could proceed with a great deal more certainty than we seem now to be able to proceed with.

Now, will the Senator from Pennsylvania persuade the Senator from Utah to withdraw his objection to the unanimous agreement which fixes the day for voting on the free-list schedule and the wool schedule, because if we could consider and pass the revisions of these schedules and one or two others of equal prominence and importance and send them to the President and ascertain in that way—and I suppose that is the only way in which it can be ascertained with absolute certainty—just what he will do with respect to them, then the problem concerning the reciprocal measure will be very much simplified?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. It does not seem to me that it would be proper to pass the free-list bill before we pass the reciprocity bill. The free-list bill is supposed to be a balm for the injuries which we will do to the farmers, and we ought not to administer the balm until we have been sure that we have injured them.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me reasonably sure that the injury is to be done. Everybody concedes that the free-list agricultural bill is to pass, and I do not see any particular objection to having the balm at least in readiness to be applied the moment the wound is inflicted.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to suggest, with the permission of the Senator, that while I do not agree as to the purpose of the passage of the free-list bill, there is such a thing as an antidote as well as compensation; some antidote is given in advance.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thank the Senator from Georgia for the very wise suggestion, and I renew my inquiry of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I fear that the Senator from Iowa is not willing to treat this legislation as impartially as I am. I have asked the Senate to agree to a date for voting on all three bills. Is he prepared to join in such an agreement regardless of the order?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not, for the very obvious reason that there is no uncertainty with regard to the President's attitude toward the reciprocal measure. No one doubts his willingness and desire to give that measure, if it shall pass, his approval. The doubt arises with regard to the other measure, and there is but one way in which to remove that doubt, namely, give the Chief Executive the opportunity which the law and Constitution give him to indicate his approval or disapproval of these measures.

Mr. PENROSE. I can not see, in all fairness, what difference it makes on this situation as to what the President is going to do; neither can I see, in my own mind, at least, what difference the action of the Senate is going to make.

I do not know, I have no information, no belief, as to whether there is a majority in the Senate to pass the free-list bill and the wool bill or not, or whether there is a majority to pass these two bills in an amended and modified form. But I am ready, as I have tried to be all my life, to bow to the inevitable, and if the Senate passes these bills I shall bow to the verdict of the only ultimate tribunal in the United States, and that is the will of a majority. If the President sees fit to approve or sign them, I shall feel as most of my colleagues will feel, that we have at least discharged our duty and not wasted our time in idle delay from day to day without accomplishing any result.

This reciprocity bill has been before the Senate now on its third week, and with the exception of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] I do not just now recall any Senator who has made the promised speeches on the measure which it was generally understood were in course of preparation. We have had running debate and idle talk without accomplishing anything, as far as I know or can see.

Now, if we could show the country that we are going to meet the issues, regardless of our personal preference or wish, it can only have a good effect, and nothing but a good effect. The country is entitled to it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. May I reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania before I yield to the Senator from Texas? I am exceedingly sorry to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania so characterize the very interesting and instructive address made by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] as well as the several addresses that were delivered yesterday, and some before, upon the amendment reported by the committee. I am sure that upon reflection the Senator will withdraw what must have been an unreflective statement, that nothing but idle talk has occurred with respect to this matter during the last week.

Mr. PENROSE. In my statement I referred more to the discussion of the general bill. Of course, the committee amendment which was defeated yesterday was not in my mind when I made the statement.

But it is well understood that some dozen Senators have signified to their associates their intention to speak at considerable length on this measure. The Senator from Iowa is one of them. And the third week of the consideration of this bill has elapsed, and not until to-morrow will the Senate have the privilege of being enlightened by his remarks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have availed myself of every convenient opportunity in the past, just as I intend to do in the future.

I trust the Senator from Pennsylvania will not comfort himself by the thought that the Senator from Iowa will make but one speech upon this matter. It is quite likely that as we draw along the length of these amendments there will be more than one occasion upon which I shall feel it necessary for me to impose myself upon the patience of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. It is with a full conviction that there will be more than one speech that I would like to see the first one unloaded.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt the Senator from Pennsylvania is awaiting with exceeding impatience the deliverance of the Senator from Iowa. I can only say that while speeches have not been very frequent, I have yet to hear anything from the Senator from Pennsylvania in behalf of the proposed measure.

But I want to assure him that he is entirely mistaken with regard to my motive. If the farmers of this country could be given the right to buy what they must buy in a free market, or a comparatively free market, I for one will vote for the reciprocity measure. It will be my only concern during the course of the entire discussion that when we take the farmer and introduce him into free competition with his only competitor, practically, we shall give him at the same time the right to buy some of the things he must buy in a market freer than we now have. It is therefore that I want to know, and I believe a great many Senators share my desire in that respect, whether we are to have at this session some amelioration of the burdens which the farmer must bear—not only bear whether this free agricultural bill is passed or not, but especially bear if it is passed. I think it is only fair, it is only honest with the American people, to determine in advance whether the relief that I have suggested is to be given to them.

I inquired, therefore, in absolute good faith of the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he would be willing to renew his request that a time be fixed for voting upon the wool bill and the free-list bill and such other bills as may be attached to it which seek to remove the burdensome duties with which we are now afflicted before we reach a conclusion upon the reciprocity measure.

Mr. BACON. I want, if the Senator will pardon me, to say a word on the matter of those orders. I was called out of the Chamber. I understand they have been disposed of. Am I correct, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have been.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to call attention to a matter that may be of importance in view of the fact that the request will probably be repeated.

Mr. STONE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STONE. I came in rather late. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania presented a request that a vote be taken on the pending bill, the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Such a request was put, and objection was made thereto.

Mr. STONE. I understood—I am asking the Chair about it—that the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania was that the three bills should be voted on—one the 24th, another on the 25th, and the third on the 26th of July.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was made in three different requests for entry of three different orders.

Mr. STONE. Did the Senator from Utah object to the entire request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] objected to the request for a vote upon the reciprocity bill. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] objected to the entry of the other two orders.

Mr. STONE. I did not understand.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as these requests are doubtless to be again proposed to the Senate, there is a matter of form to which I think it is important to call attention. I did not call attention to it while on the floor before, because I did not wish that anything I should say might be construed into any objection to voting upon the days designated, but I think the form of request is one which, if adopted, contravenes two rules of the Senate; and it is with a view of having the request, if hereafter presented, conform to those rules that I now call attention to them.

The request was that on a certain day and a certain hour the bills should be considered as engrossed and read the third time. Am I correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BACON. I say that that can not be done by unanimous consent, because the rules of the Senate, which can only be modified or changed in the way indicated by the rules, expressly provide that, in the first place, bills shall be considered in Committee of the Whole, and that indicates, of course, that they shall pass from Committee of the Whole. But what is more directly to the point is Rule XV. I will read that rule:

RULE XV. 1. All bills and joint resolutions which shall have received two readings shall first be considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, after which they shall be reported to the Senate.

That is one rule. Mr. President, I say that that can not be obviated or dispensed with by unanimous consent. A rule can only be changed by the method prescribed in the rules themselves, which it is not necessary I should recite. What is perhaps more important is Rule XIV:

RULE XIV. 2. Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings previous to its passage, which readings shall be on three different days, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise.

The Senate can, by unanimous consent, dispense with the provision which requires the reading to be on three separate days, but the Senate can not by unanimous consent dispense with the three readings. We do dispense every day with the three several readings by having the two readings announced as having been made upon the first day.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is important, if the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to repeat the request or again present it to the Senate, that that point shall be guarded against. I think the only thing which is practicable is that the Senate shall do as we did, the Chair will remember, upon the former occasion—provide that we will take the matter up for disposition at the stage in which it is found at that time. It is perfectly competent for the Senate, before it reaches that day, to take it up and pass it from the Committee of the Whole into the Senate, and to pass the stage of the engrossment and third reading, and then bring it within the operation of the proposed consent. But I respectfully submit that with that positive provision in the rule we can not, in advance, say that a bill shall be considered as read the third time. Of course, I know that in the House of Representatives, where the rules are different, that is a constant practice, and a proper practice; and I am not prepared to say but that it might be a desirable practice here; but it is certainly, in my opinion, absolutely in conflict with the rules of the Senate.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not believe it is the will of the Senate to ask for conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion.

Mr. HEYBURN. The motion is debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the House action be read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will, without objection, again read the resolution of the House.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 21, 1911.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the motion go over for the day. The Senate does not necessarily have to ask for conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not necessarily; but the motion has been made, and it is in order. It does not have to go over. It is one of the motions which, under the rule, should be proceeded with until disposed of.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the joint resolution does not go over by a mere objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems to me that the proper action is that the Senate do not concur in the action of the House. This is not upon an amendment; it is upon a joint resolution. The amendment has been absorbed in the joint resolution. I had not expected that a motion to appoint conferees would be made at this time. Of course the question next would come up on the adoption of the conference report. But it is a question whether the Senate should ask for a conference, the House not having asked for one.

The joint resolution came from the House. The Senate amended it and it went back to the House, and they declined to agree to the amendment and did not ask for conferees. It is not the usual manner of proceeding. The question will arise now as to the vote required to send it to conference, because it is an entirety and it will affect the enactment of the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will remember that the amendment in the Senate was passed by a majority vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. But after it is passed the amendment can never again be considered by a majority vote, because the amendment became a part of the joint resolution. It is no longer an amendment.

Mr. BACON. What went to the House is an amendment solely.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not an amendment now.

Mr. BACON. Yes; it is, so far as they are concerned. That is what they resolved they will not accept.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield the floor. I merely wanted that we should not just glide along and then afterwards discover that we had been on slippery ground.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let the question be put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. BACON the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ALFRED D. BULLOCK AND OTHERS.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred certain bills, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 83), which were considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That in compliance with a communication from the chief justice of the Court of Claims, the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to return to the Court of Claims the congressional cases of Alfred D. Ashe and others, No. 14860—141, certified to the President of the Senate under date of January 30, 1911 (S. Doc. No. 796, 61st Cong., 3d sess.); Mary A. F. Barry, widow, and others, No. 14124—20, certified to the President of the Senate under date of March 23, 1910 (S. Doc. No. 172, 59th Cong., 2d sess.), and the said court is hereby authorized to proceed in said cases as if no return therein had been made to the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 85), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals is hereby authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON CANADIAN RELATIONS.

Mr. OLIVER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 87), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Canadian Relations is hereby authorized to employ an assistant clerk at a salary of $1,800 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

TELEGRAPH SERVICE IN SENATE OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 86), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Vice President is hereby authorized to direct the institution of the departmental telegraph instruments in the Senate

Office Building, and provide competent service therein, at a compensation of not to exceed $1,800 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

CHUGACH NATIONAL FOREST LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 84) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate of the United States copies of all letters, maps, executive or departmental orders or instructions, surveys, also applications to enter land, or for rights of way of railroads or otherwise, and all other official reports, recommendations, documents, or records in the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture, or by any of the officials or bureaus of these departments, not included in the report of the Secretary of the Interior of April 26, 1911, printed as Senate Document No. 12, Sixty-second Congress, first session, relating in any way to the elimination from the Chugach National Forest in Alaska of land fronting upon Controller Bay, approximating 12,800 acres; especially referring to such papers, documents, etc., as relate to applications of the Controller Railroad & Navigation Co. for rights of way or confirmation of its maps of rights of way or harbor rights or privileges in or near to the said Controller Bay, or upon the Chugach National Forest, or upon lands eliminated therefrom, or upon tide lands or shore lands of the said Controller Bay, with such information, if any, as is in the possession of the War Department, relating to the character of Controller Bay as a harbor, its soundings, and a designation of those portions of the harbor which are available for the use of deep-water vessels.

Also, to include in the report hereby requested the names of the soldiers whose claims are to be used as bases for the applications for the land referred to, the mesne and subsequent assignments, and other data relating thereto, with a statement of the present status of all said applications to enter said lands or for rights of way thereon.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, after a long contest, extending over more than two years, the attempt to monopolize the vast coal deposits of the Bering River coal fields has been defeated, so far as the acquisition of title to the said coal lands is concerned, by the decision of the Secretary of the Interior in the so-called Cunningham coal claims case June 26, 1911.

It now seems evident that the interests which were seeking to monopolize the natural resources of Alaska were not dependent entirely upon one method. Control of transportation and access to these coal fields is equivalent to control of the coal itself. The harbor of Controller Bay, which is protected by a double natural breakwater, is the only available protected deep-water harbor within reasonable access to these coal fields. Realizing this fact, the national administration, February 26, 1909, withdrew from public entry that portion of the shore lines of Controller Bay which was essential in the use of its harbor and navigable channel. This left the situation so that the use of this harbor could be preserved for the public or granted upon such conditions as would insure it against monopoly. However, on October 28, 1910, without notice, this shore line, by Executive order, was restored to public entry, and immediately thereafter, before the public were advised of this fact, one James J. Ryan and others who are connected with the Controller Railroad & Navigation Co. made application to enter certain portions of the shore of Controller Bay which, with the incidental rights incident thereto and harbor privileges for which they had made application to the Government, will give them a complete monopoly of the use of Controller Bay as a harbor and of the sole practicable and available deep-water access to the Bering River coal fields. The rights so applied for have not yet matured or been confirmed, and in order that the fraudulent monopoly which was defeated by the decision of the Secretary of the Interior in the Cunningham coal cases should not be acquired by these other means of the monopoly of Controller Bay, and in order that the benefit of this very excellent act of the present administration should not be entirely lost, the status of these appliactions and all of the transactions leading up to the same should be thoroughly investigated and made public.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will move to insert at the proper place in the resolution the words "if not incompatible with the public interest." I presume the Senator from Washington will agree to that amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington accepts the amendment. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "requested" insert "if not incompatible with the public interest."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a minute. I came in after the resolution had been partly read. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington whether it provides for the publication of the report as a public document?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; it does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It simply asks for the information.

Mr. POINDEXTER. When the report is made, I shall ask that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. Then will be time enough, after the report comes in.

PRICES OF SUGAR IN PRINCIPAL MARKETS.

Mr. GRONNA. I have received from the Department of Commerce and Labor 15 tables, prepared in the Bureau of Statistics, showing the movement of sugar prices in the principal European and American markets during the more recent period, together with prices for standard grades of both raw and refined sugar. I ask that the matter be printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 55.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that I have examined the paper, and it brings the sugar prices down to date. I have no objection at all to the printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is entered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12109. An act to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity measure, House bill 4412.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, our predecessors have proceeded primarily upon the principle that "he who does not first care for his own household is worse than an infidel," but they did not ignore its corollary, viz, in a republic that household is related to every other in a measure, and he who will not recognize those relations and accept whatever enlarges the real benefits of his household by extending rights and benefits to others is something less than highly christianized. Tariffs are, in a measure, restraints upon trade; but in order to maintain a country at its highest efficiency in trade, industry, and for international peace and amity, it must develop its own resources and encourage diversity of enterprise by offering proper inducement to the investment of capital in those things which can and ought to be done here through the employment of American genius and American labor, at the highest possible wage and standard of living. To attain this highest condition it is necessary that a tariff approximately equal to the difference in cost of production here and abroad be imposed upon competing articles seeking entrance into the United States from countries having a lower standard of wages and living than ours. With this as a rule, and omitting for the time the question of revenue, it would seem that it was the clear duty of the United States, and for its best good, to enter into the freest relations possible with those nations where the conditions of living and industry are similar to those of our own country.

Does the Dominion of Canada come within the class of nations to which such description applies? After the most careful and unbiased study of which I am capable, I believe that it does. We have now reached the time when the individual Senator must decide this matter for himself, and I feel that I must vote for the agreement entered into by the representatives of the two countries. Personally, I would not have brought it forward at this time and in this form if I had been in control of the matter. I would have striven hard and long for a treaty which would have included all of the products of Canadian and United States industries in the free list, for I am convinced that reciprocity with Canada can never be the greatest success until manufactured, as well as natural products, meet no customs wall in passing between the two countries. Under the pending measure there will be too many opportunities for national changes and discriminations in tariffs for its unquestioned permanence and safety. Furthermore, the country is being disturbed in its every industrial part by pending and threatening tariff revisions; and if depression comes, as I fear it may, reciprocity will be credited with being the entering wedge of business disaster, and repudiation may be the result. I am sorry that some Senators feel that it is the part of good statesmanship to indulge so extensively in extravagant and inflammatory statements and in such peculiar methods intended to complicate the passage of the measure, but which may result in embarrassment to its administration when enacted into law.

But the matter is here in this form. It has been presented by a Republican President, whom nobody has openly charged with mercenary or improper motives, and it is not out of harmony with the time-honored principle of a Republican protective tariff. That principle is, in effect, that duties should be levied only upon imports from nations where the cost of production is substantially less than the cost in this country. The cost of production in Canada of the products included in the pending measure is not materially, if it is any, less than the cost of production of such articles in the United States. The people of the two countries are the same in blood, in civilization, in methods of living, in ideals, and in destiny. Indeed, people from the States are almost as numerous in many parts of Canada as those born under the British Jack, and the percentage of Canadian-born citizens in the United States is very large. We are closer neighbors to Canada in every sense of the word than we are to any other nation on earth. If the fortune and circumstance of post-Revolutionary treaties had not arbitrarily fixed the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the forty-ninth parallel, instead of 54° 40′, as the boundary line between Canada and the United States, no voice would now be raised against a bigger America. It would have seemed in the eternal fitness of things that there should be one great economic unit in habitable America north of the Gulf of Mexico. It is one country by nature, but in the economy of man it has been made into two, accompanied by all the economic waste of separate organizations. There is little hope or prospect that one flag will float over Washington and Ottawa, but surely two nations bound so closely together by nature should not be separated by commercial and industrial barriers. Several times in our history we have been close to commercial freedom with Canada, and at one fatal hour we were close to national unity. I say fatal, not that the union would have been disastrous, but because the hour was untimely struck. The occasion was not right. Had no unusual or unforeseen difficulties arisen during the continuance of the Marcy-Elgin treaty of 1854–1866, I believe by this time there would have been no trade controversy over Canada, for there would have been but one commercial flag on the Western Continent north of Mexico. Feeling in the United States during the Civil War was embittered by British sympathy with the southern cause, and Canada became the asylum for southern sympathizers. The Alabama was fitted out in British ports and waters to prey upon and harass the interests of the United States. The treaty period, unfortunately, ended about the time of the close of the war. The sentiment of the North was hostile to everything pro-British. The Alabama claims came up for settlement, and in the later sixties there was a general feeling throughout this country that the proper compensation for England to make to the United States was to cede Canada to it. Senator Sumner, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, openly advocated annexation, and in the early part of 1870 Secretary of State Hamilton Fish urged upon England's ambassador, Sir Edward Thornton, the advisability of England's withdrawal from Canada. The ambassador was instructed to consent to this proposition if Canada would take the initiative, but this Canada refused to do, owing to the intense feeling which had grown up as the result of the events of the Civil War and of the revocation by the United States of the treaty of 1854.

Before and at the time of the Elgin treaty there was much talk of union between Canada and the United States. But at that time the dissensions over slavery between the two sections of our country impeded, if they did not prevent, annexation. The North was for annexation—the South was against it and advocated reciprocity in trade as a preventive of union. The addition of Canada to the United States would be increasing free territory, for slavery could not exist in the North. Indeed, the pages of the history of our relations with Canada seem full of untimely and unsuccessful efforts at union and reciprocity, and it has been impossible to strike the time and occasion right. The people of both countries have not, however, given up hope, and still express a longing for those mutual advantages which are possible in unrestricted commercial intercourse.

The bill before us is not a realization of our hopes and desires. It is, however, a distinct recognition of international comity. It is an agreement to begin taking down the useless wall between parts of the same industrial field. It is the best that can be obtained now. Shall we refuse to begin a universally acknowledged good work when we have the chance simply because it does not begin or end at the place we would have selected? Or because we are piqued at the architect who laid out the plans? Or because the scheme does not and can not contain all of our notions as to what should be in it? If we wait for such objections to disappear we will never begin. Let us accept it with the hope that none of the extraneous difficulties encountered in the past shall intervene, and that once engaged in the work of friendship we shall become better friends and together shall understand that the removal of the ugly and useless barriers to trade will extend Canada's horizon to the south and that of the United States to the north, so that the eye of industry may sweep with unbroken vision from Hudsons Bay to the Gulf of Mexico.

But, Mr. President, we are told that this measure will inure to the benefit of Canada and work to the detriment of the United States; and as proof of this the proponents of that theory bring forward those arguments, and only those, which could with equal force be urged against reciprocity among the States. The United States lies between the two oceans; so does Canada. The United States is in the North Temperate Zone; so is habitable Canada. The United States lies south and Canada north of an imaginary line which can not be located except by a surveyor. The only difference is that Canada, being north, shades into the Frigid Zone, and for every degree it extends north from our northern boundary the season for agriculture is shortened and the risks from frosts and droughts increase. It is probable that in time much of the agricultural land of Canada will be utilized for wheat. This will occur as fast as the world's demand encourages it. This development will take place in full measure only when and because such demand shall warrant the higher price which the additional risks will make necessary. I know that many men have sold their developed high-priced lands in the States and have gone into Canada to take up the lower-priced lands there in the hope that the rise in value of these virgin lands will bring them a fortune in a few years. It is the same idea which actuates men to buy even intrinsically worthless land near a growing city. They expect that the city in its growth will some day reach them, when their property will warrant draining, filling, and platting for city property. Some of these immigrants to Canada will have the endurance and strength and financial ability to abide the time, which is sure to come, when from the increase in land values they will reap their reward; but for me, I would prefer to clear a farm from among the forests and stump barrens of Michigan than to encounter the frosts and privations of northern Canada. Already hundreds of disappointed Americans are wending their way back to the United States—"God's country," as they call it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Gladly.

Mr. BORAH. Notwithstanding that fact, 100,000 Americans last year left the United States and went to Canada, and have become permanent citizens there.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Last year 124,000 people went from the United States into Canada. I am not prepared to say what proportion of them were native-born Americans. I know that 94,000 people left Canada and came into the United States during that time, and I do know that of that number 23,000 were men who had lived in the United States and had gone into Canada and come back.

Mr. BORAH. Those who left Canada and came back were not of the same element of the producing classes as those who left the United States and went into Canada. They were following other vocations. I know that there are now a million and a half Canadians in this country, but they are not engaged in farming.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not prepared to dispute that statement, because I have not investigated as to the particular vocations which those people entered. I simply know that the report shows that 124,000 people from the United States went into Canada last year and 94,000 from Canada came here. This means that the percentage of immigration from Canada into the United States is larger than the percentage of emigration from the United States into Canada.

But Canada will, in the course of time, be developed, and hundreds of millions of bushels of hardy short-seasoned wheat will be produced; but I repeat, that will be when there is a market for it and that market will be caused by the increased consumption of wheat and by the decreased production in other at present wheat-growing sections. To-day the production of wheat in the United States is the greatest in the history of our country, and it will never be less; but only about one farmer in five grows wheat. I ought to say also that while it is charged that Canada is rapidly increasing her wheat production, last year she produced 17,000,000 bushels less than she did the year before, and that her agricultural products in 1910 amounted to something like $26,000,000 less than they did in 1909.

Gradually the longer-settled portions of this country are abandoning the culture of wheat for more profitable products, and when the natural wheat-producing soil is exhausted it is turned over to other uses, and as wheat growing decreases, in proportion to consumption, the price will tend to rise, and those who are wedded to wheat culture, and can not be divorced from it, will be consoled by the fact that it will pay them to so fertilize the soil and cultivate the crop as to obtain a proper return for their toil and outlay.

To-day if all the surplus wheat of Canada found an outlet through American markets, it would not, in my opinion, materially affect the price. If we used Canada's export we could and would export more of our own crop. But we will not use it. The surplus from both countries will continue to find its market abroad except in case of a crop failure in either country. Then the other country will supply, as it ought to supply, the deficiency.

I do not believe there is any prospect of the supply of wheat outrunning the demand. It is true that for years the trend of population has been away from the farm and to the city, but that simply increased the demand for wheat. Producers have become consumers.

But, Mr. President, the opponents of this measure base their prophecies of disaster to the farmers upon the proposition that Canadian prices are lower than United States prices, and wheat is the overworked item of illustration. Now, I can see no good reason for arguing that because prices are higher in one country than they are in another therefore the country of higher prices will be injured by a removal of duties. Some have also contended as though it was the business of the Government to insure selling prices. When before did the advocates of protection ever publicly announce that a tariff was inaugurated to increase prices? When infant industries which ought to have been established in this country were seeking to establish themselves it was the policy of the Republican Party to afford protection against the stronger and better organized institutions abroad, and under those circumstances the Government was properly generous, but when such industries here have become established, then no one has intelligently urged that a duty should be retained for protection except in cases where, by reason of higher wages paid and other greater legitimate expenses incurred, the cost of production to our producers was materially greater than the cost to our competitors, and I at least have always had in mind that this system would induce competition among our producers which would eventually cheapen products to the consumer. And it has done so.

In other words, I have believed, and I still believe, that we should protect those, and only those, of our home industries which should exist here in which the legitimate cost of production is materially greater than it is with their competitors, and then only to the extent of the difference in such cost, and this means that cost and not selling price is the basis for fixing tariffs.

But let us take, for argument's sake, the position assumed by the opponents of this measure, removal or reduction of duties means a loss to the country of higher prices. Measured by their standard, will the bill, if enacted into law, be a financial detriment to our farmer?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator there upon what theory, then, has it been that the Republican Party has universally, since the repeal of the treaty in 1865, opposed this kind of an arrangement with Canada? Upon what basis has it made its objection if it were not for the purpose of protecting the price of the farmer in the sale of his products?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not believe that the Republican Party or that Republicans generally have universally opposed such a treaty with Canada. I am convinced, after having read the history of all the relations between this country and Canada, that there has been a disposition on the part of the people of this country and of Canada to establish just such mutual relations as are now proposed and that disposition existed even before the treaty of 1854.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator now to take the time to do so, but I will before very long show the Senator that the Republican Party in every campaign where the issue has been up, including the campaign which brought the present administration into power, specifically denounced the lowering of the duties between this country and Canada for fear of reducing the price of the products of the farmer.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But, Mr. President, if it shall be demonstrated that that fear is not well founded; if at the same time we are preserving the real fundamental principle of the Republican protective tariff or Republican protection, namely, a duty which measures the difference in the cost of production, are we not still proceeding according to Republican notions and doctrines?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; if it should be demonstrated; but there would be another interesting question arise then, and that is when the demonstration took place and what was the cause of the change which produced the change of position in the party on that subject?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall have to differ from the Senator from Idaho in his assertion that the party has changed its position on that subject. I may have been peculiar in my environment and my relations politically, but I have never understood any other doctrine as the one adopted by the Republican Party than the one I have announced to-day.

I am insisting, Mr. President, that the basis for fixing a tariff has never been the selling price, but rather the cost of production. But if for argument sake we shall agree that it is the business of Government to see to it that prices are higher in the United States than they are in Canada, and that by reducing the tariff between this and that country on articles that would come in to compete, we would thereby reduce the selling price here and injure the producer. I say, assuming that all this is true for argument sake—and it is the only way I will assume it to be true—let us see what we will get from this particular bill; let us see exactly what must result if we are to apply that doctrine as I propose to apply it now.

Let us refer to wheat again. During the last 19 years wheat has fluctuated in price in Canada and in the United States. In 1890, 1891, 1897, 1899, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907, and 1900 wheat was higher in the United States than it was in Winnipeg. In some of those years the difference was negligible. During the years 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1900, 1901, and 1908 wheat was higher in Winnipeg than it was in Chicago. This shows that during 11 of the last 19 years wheat averaged higher in the United States than it did in Canada, and during 8 of those 19 years it averaged lower in the United States than in Canada. Now, if we apply the standard heretofore mentioned and say that the United States farmer would have lost on his wheat during the designated 11 years when wheat was higher in the United States than it was in Canada, if the United States tariff had been removed, shall we not be obliged to apply the same doctrine, per contra, and assert with equal certainty that he would have gained during the 8 years when wheat was higher in Canada than it was in the United States if the Canadian tariff had been removed?

If such would be the logical result of this theory, will it not be necessary to figure up and strike a balance by arithmetical calculation before we know whether the farmer would have been injured by free trade in wheat with Canada? What is true of wheat is even more marked in reference to other farm products. During practically all of the last 19 years corn, oats, milk, hogs and hog products, and sheep have been higher in Canada than in the United States, and every farm product has, during some of the last 19 years, been higher in Canada than it has been in the United States.

How will gentlemen escape from the conclusion which their own logic produces? If a removal of all duties on agricultural products reduces values in some cases, it must, by the same token, increase them in others.

I have heard much about the failure of the bill to reduce the duty on articles which the farmer uses. Have gentlemen read the bill so carelessly as to have overlooked the fact that lumber is on the free list; and if the duty imposes extra cost to the consumer, then certainly it is the lumberman and not the farmer who will be injured by a remission of this duty, for the latter will not have his lumber charged with a tariff duty of $1.25 per thousand. Shall he not be credited with this item?

The bill provides that the duty of 45 per cent on hay loaders, potato diggers, feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, rollers, and hay tedders shall be reduced to 25 per cent, or a reduction of 45 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator from Michigan object to interruptions?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator wishes to make a continuous speech I will not interrupt him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should not like to be interrupted for a speech, but for a question I shall be very willing to yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Has the Senator made any estimate of what the average farmer would gain in a period of 10 or 15 years if he got the full benefit of the reduction of a dollar and a quarter a thousand upon his lumber?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I have not. It would be very small.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is a matter of fact that an ordinary frame house will last about 45 years, is it not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, I should think so.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are about 10,000 feet of lumber in the ordinary farmhouse. And if that was the case, saving a dollar and a half on a thousand feet would be a saving of $15 on his lumber bill once in 45 years, or 33 cents a year; something like that. Would you consider that an important element to balance against a loss of 25 cents on barley for every bushel he would raise?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have shown, unless I have failed, that these articles vary in prices, sometimes higher and sometimes lower in Canada than they are in the United States. I have just begun an enumeration of some of the items. Now, I am going to admit to the Senator from North Dakota that I do not take very much stock in this notion that the removal of the duty on lumber or on wheat is going to make any appreciable difference in the price of either one of them—and I am referring to lumber and other products in order to apply the rule laid down by Senators who insist that the selling price shall be the standard for fixing the tariff.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator why he goes back 19 or 20 years and gives us a general conclusion of a period of 20 years or 19 years, the most of which years were in a period in which, on account of our enormous surplus, we were compelled to sell upon the basis of foreign values, while, when we had reduced our surplus so that it was almost nothing, in 1909 and in 1910, or reduced it so very low, the home demand rather than the foreign demand applies? Why does he not take up those years for a comparison, and if he will take the last three or four years he will find there has never been a time, unless through a cornering of the market at some particular period, in which the Canadian price under like conditions would come within from 10, and sometimes within as high as 20, cents a bushel as our wheat, and when our flax crop was short and when our barley crop was short, as within the last year, there was a difference of fully 30 cents a bushel on each of them.

It seems to me the Senator ought to take those years, because those years meet our present condition, and they foreshadow what we may expect in the future from Canada.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from North Dakota I will state that the reason I went back to 1890 was because that was the first year about which I can obtain statistics in Canada as to the price of products. I asked for a compilation to be made from 1850 to date. I submit that the method I have pursued is the only fair one to pursue in this matter.

The Senator seems to think that there were some unusual conditions which existed a few years ago which created a large surplus, and that the latter few years are the only ones to be governed by. Peculiar conditions are found in all periods. I have felt that we should take the country with all of the conditions which can be found only through a period of years. And I have taken every year that we have any reports on from Canada and the United States, in order that there might be no charge that there has been a juggling of figures or dates for the purpose of meeting the emergency.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will pardon me. There is no question about the accuracy of his figures. But while the figures will always speak accurately, they speak accurately only of a condition at the time. The same figures applied to certain conditions now will produce entirely different results. For instance, the Senator will admit that a very little surplus has a big influence in driving prices down, and a very little shortage has a great influence in pushing prices up. Therefore, figures and conditions that applied to years when we were producing an enormous surplus and Canada was producing little surplus, we will say per capita, because that is the fairer estimate, are entirely different when applied to conditions in which we are practically consuming all that we produce, and Canada, on the other hand, has an enormous surplus which is still growing.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But which is still growing less. As I stated a moment ago, Canada's production last year was 17,000,000 bushels less than it was in 1909, and her exportations were $26,000,000 worth of agricultural products less than it was——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. But the Senator undoubtedly informed the Senate at the time that there was almost no crop in all that northwestern country, and that year has nothing to do with the possibilities of that country, because all the statistics, Canadian and American, agree that Canada has land there on which she can produce from one to five billion bushels of wheat.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not mention that suggestion. I ought to have done it for another reason, and that was to emphasize the fact, as I stated a moment ago, that because of Canada's peculiar geographical location, she has to meet the exigencies of drought and frost, which would make her not a dangerous competitor of the United States one year with another.

The bill further provides that manure spreaders and windmills—and I call the particular attention of those politicians and lobbyists who are so solicitous of the farmers' interests to these items, manure spreaders and windmills—it provides, I say, that the duty on these articles shall be reduced from 45 per cent to 20 per cent, or a reduction in duty of 55 per cent.

I am not presenting this information, I will say to the Senator, because I believe the American farmer is going to get his tools any cheaper by this reduction. I am simply presenting it, however, because if you are going to apply this doctrine, that a reduction of duty means a reduction in price, you must apply it to all of the articles in order to have it fair, because I think it works as clearly in one case as it does in another.

If this rule, which opponents of the bill have invoked, is applied to some items, I must insist that it be applied to all items, and then the account balanced through profit and loss.

But if Canada is really getting the best of the bargain, what a misguided, misinformed lot of farmers and statesmen and newspaper men there are in the Dominion. From the St. Thomas (Ontario) Daily Times of Saturday, June 10, 1911, I clipped the following:

ONLY 2 STOOD UP IN FAVOR OF PACT OUT OF 143 FARMERS AT RECIPROCITY MEETING AT STRAFFORDVILLE ON FRIDAY NIGHT—STRONG RESOLUTION.

STRAFFORDVILLE, June 10.

The largest mass meeting held here in the last 25 years was the gathering addressed in the town hall on Friday night by splendid speakers on the question of reciprocity. The speakers were the same as were at Aylmer the previous night, except that T. W. Crothers, M. P., of St. Thomas, was not present, namely, David Marshall, M. P.; Richard Blain, M. P. for Peel; Joseph E. Armstrong, M. P. for East Lambton; C. A. Brower, M. P.; W. A. Jones, president Bayham Liberal-Conservative Association, chairman; and Dr. Johnston, of Port Burwell, secretary Bayham Liberal-Conservative Association. By actual count there were 143 farmers present, and all listened with attention and frequent applause to the excellent speeches.

A STIRRING RESOLUTION.

A stirring resolution disapproving of the proposed reciprocity agreement was submitted to the audience, and with but two exceptions every man rose to his feet in unqualified approval of the resolution, which was as follows:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this meeting, reciprocity between Canada and the United States would be against the best interests of the Canadian people, and we heartily indorse the stand taken by Mr. R. L. Borden and David Marshall, our esteemed representatives, on this question and hope that they will compel the Government to submit the question to the electors of Canada for their decision."

Those 141 farmers evidently do not understand this bill as its opponents here understand it. I confess I believe there is more reason for fear of the measure on the part of Canada than there is on the part of our people, and yet I do not think that anything but real good can eventually come to either country on account of its enactment. It would, however, be easier for me to conjure up fear of injury from the treaty if I were a Canadian than it is for me, an American, to imagine injury from it.

One must be particularly impressed with the arguments against this proposition by the Hon. George E. Foster, M. P., in the May number of the North American Review of this year. Mr. Foster is a member of the privy council, was educated in New Brunswick, at Edinburgh, and at Heidelberg, and has been minister of marine and minister of finance for Canada. He surely seems to be qualified to speak, and his experience in and knowledge of Canadian affairs and conditions entitles his opinions to great consideration. I submit an abstract of some parts of his article in the North American Review:

It (the Canadian reciprocity bill) has been condemned by the Boards of Trade of Toronto, Winnipeg, and Montreal, and by the Associate Boards of Trade of Ontario; by the Food Growers' Association of Ontario and British Columbia; by the market gardeners, by the business, banking, industrial, and transport interests, and by the Legislatures of New Brunswick, British Columbia, Manitoba, and Ontario. The Elgin-Marcy treaty was terminated against the wish of Canada. Canada's answer was the confederation of the disconnected Provinces, the evolution of a strong Canadian ideal, and the birth of a new nation. From that moment a new alignment of forces and a new trend of development superseded the ideals and plans of the past. The agreement narrows and restricts our (Canada's) fiscal freedom. It might temporarily suit our prairie Provinces, which raise no fruit, if fruit came in free from the United States; but if this deprived Ontario and British Columbia, which are large producers of fruit, of their market in these Provinces, and, in addition, exposed them to a ruinous competition in their own home market, the result would be otherwise than beneficial to Canadian development as a whole. It would shift the best of a profitable production from Canada to the United States, diminish the volumes of interprovincial traffic, and retard the home development of the food industry.

The pact is urged upon Canada on the ground that it opens to our farmers a market of 90,000,000 people. How much of that 90,000,000 market is accessible to our eggs, butter, cheese, fruits, vegetables, live stock, grain, and meat productions? Distance and cost of transport cut out nine-tenths and more. The remaining fraction is scattered along 4,000 miles of frontier, and its demands are modified by contingencies of seasons and localities. Even then our products, where they go, must compete with similar products raised near by and with cheaper access and better organized distribution.

But we can not forget that the same pact opens up the markets of Canada to the competition of 12 times as many producers whose seasonal and sectional surplus can be poured into the present home markets of our producers; the vast organized collecting and distributing trusts in meats, provisions, and agricultural products could easily flood our more accessible markets and become formidable competitors of our less highly organized producers and distributors. They have also to contend with climatic disadvantages in many lines of production, such as added feeding and fuel expenses, in more rigorous weather conditions, and in later and shorter seasons, which handicap them in comparison with more southern competitors.

Both your parties—

He refers to the two parties in the United States—are protectionist, and apparently intend to remain so. Yet you offer to Canada free trade in all products, though you refuse it to the rest of the world. Why? You want extended markets for your manufactures, and you see to the north 8,000,000 consumers likely to be increased to 100,000,000 by the end of the century. You are becoming less and less exporters of food and raw materials and more and more exporters of finished products. Your natural resources are gradually diminishing, while Canada has immense virgin supplies. Access to this country will give you exactly what you desire in this respect. You will be able to replenish your depleted stores of raw material, carry on your manufacturing processes more profitably, and sell the finished products in the northern markets. In a word, you desire to make Canada for trade purposes like unto a State of the Union, except that you do not propose to employ your capital within her borders. You will draw her raw resources to your very own country and work them up by your very own people, and, of course, reap the profits.

The reciprocity pact cuts straight across this development and this ideal, disconnects our Provinces, attacks our industries, taps our east and west connections by north and south lines, and menaces our national solidarity.

Is it not strange that the Canadian boards of trade, food growers' associations, market gardeners, and farmers should oppose a measure which will bring them all the benefits which the opponents of this measure in the United States find in it for the Canadians?

This bill can not harm the farmers. It is the beginning of a policy which I have long favored, viz, a change of tariff conditions in conformity with the well-understood theory of protection. The items in this measure are clearly understood. We know what the cost of production is here and in Canada. As fast as the facts can be obtained in reference to other items and other countries the tariff schedules should be revised and a scientific system of duties established.

I want the wool, cotton, steel, and other schedules revised if a determination of facts disclose that revision is needed. I will not, however, close my eyes and blindly proceed in the matter. I do not believe that the people have repudiated the principle of protection. They have protested against old, unscientific methods. They want to know from competent authority what the difference in cost of production is in order that a duty equalizing that difference can be imposed.

Gentlemen have constructed a scarecrow from the bill of such hideous mien that they have become greatly frightened at their own creation. But, Mr. President, if the good which comes from this measure shall be confined to the benefits which flow directly and immediately from it, and they shall be all that can be expected, it will hardly be worth the political strife and bitterness which it has engendered, but to me it is only an incident to greater things which must grow out of it.

He who looks at the map of North America, after he has rubbed out all artificial political lines, sees a country of fields and forests, of mountains and plains, of rivers and lakes, of mineral and agricultural resources, distributed with lavish hand by the Great Creator of all, and yet not recklessly, but with almost apparent design.

The natural needs of one section can be readily supplied from another and one thus becomes the complement of the other. It is man's business to develop these natural resources and distribute where needed. If you look at that map you will see that nature's commercial highways are the lakes and rivers and seas, and they are not private but they are public highways. The Mississippi with its great tributaries connect the southern and middle western portions of this domain with the Gulf of Mexico. The Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence reach from the very heart of the continent to the Atlantic Ocean, and with these waterways fully developed, utilized, and controlled the transportation problems would be practically solved.

We have now settled the question of boundary between the United States and Canada. No fishery disputes disturb the amity of the two countries. An international high commission has been provided, to which all disputes will be submitted for settlement—the perplexing questions of international rates of common carriers have been cared for. This bill will be, we hope, a step in the direction of commercial peace and harmony. Thus the way will be open for the beginning of the final and greatest achievement of all, viz, the opening up to the mighty commerce of Canada and the United States a deep waterway from the Lakes to the ocean through that international stream, the St. Lawrence River.

And now, Mr. President, I desire in as brief a time as possible to discuss the amendment which I have offered to the so-called Canadian reciprocity measure and give to Senators the reasons which induced me to offer and support it.

May I ask the Secretary to read the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of improving the St. Lawrence River from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean and waterways connecting the Great Lakes, the President of the United States is authorized and directed to enter into an agreement with the Dominion of Canada which shall provide, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for a waterway of sufficient depth and width to accommodate deep-water or seagoing vessels for the common use and benefit of both countries and in furtherance of reciprocal trade relations between them: Provided, however, That said agreement before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is probable that the provision is not as well worded as it might be, but it is sufficiently clear to enable the Congress to understand it and the President to comprehend its intent, if it shall be presented to him for his action. It clearly does not affect the provisions of the bill, or any of them. It simply instructs the President to continue his efforts for the further reciprocal good of Canada and the United States.

I will, as best I can, present some of the benefits which would come to the people of the United States and of Canada from a deep or ocean waterway from the Great Lakes to the ocean, via the St. Lawrence River, and then I will discuss the feasibility of the project.

I think I realize some of the objections which will be urged against this amendment, and I confess that I have no hope of accomplishing its object until the utmost trust and confidence, the most complete faith and good will, exist between the people of the United States and Canada.

Being convinced that the project which I propose will confer greater benefits on both countries than those which flow from any tariff—that it would be, in fact, the consummation of the greatest contemplated benefits in trade—I seek to project it upon the attention of the Senate and of the country.

It is commonly accepted as true that the industrial and commercial progress of the world has depended in direct ratio upon the progress and development of the means of transportation.

In their primitive state mankind have been content to produce only what they have desired, and their desires were limited to the simple needs for satisfying hunger and for protection against the elements. But when their desires were increased and they wanted other than what they individually produced, the carrier or transporter became a necessity. At first the means of transportation were crude vehicles, hauled by men or animals on land, and equally crude boats and canoes, propelled by oars or wind on the water. The latter was the most efficient, and settlements followed the course of streams and waterways. But these streams and waterways were limited and only penetrated a small portion of the country. Watercourses were nature's highways, and to the people who could use them they furnished cheap means of transportation.

The interior portions of the country were in many cases more fertile and productive than land adjacent to navigable waters. Minerals of great value existed in places remote from water, and as these lands and minerals came into demand land transportation received attention. In due course the railroad was born and the country was settled up. Railroad building at first was slow, but as the possibilities of railroading, both speculative and practical, became more apparent, as inventive genius became more active, railroad companies were formed and lines constructed. There was a real contest for railroad business. That was before the age of consolidation. In time roads sufficient for the ordinary needs of industry were constructed; then began the struggle of railroad operators for monopoly; then began the age of consolidation. It was, however, a consolidation of railroads. The boat lines were independent, and wherever they existed they furnished real competition.

This Government has recognized the value of water transportation. It has spent $650,000,000 in improving its rivers and harbors, and has entered upon a most extensive and comprehensive policy of waterway improvement. It is seeking vigorously and intelligently, though not yet altogether effectively, to regulate land carriers; but about the only thing which has effectively resulted in securing low and reasonable rail rates has been the establishment of water competition.

No one complains of rail rates between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, for these coasts are connected by the two oceans, and the land rate must meet the ocean rate. The charges by rail from Duluth to Buffalo are reasonable, because the lake boats make them so. The freight tariffs from the East or West to the Mississippi River are much lower than those over the same lines to nearer points from place of shipment but which have not the actual or possible advantages of Mississippi navigation. Indeed, the Salt Lake City merchant who buys goods in Boston or New York bills them through his home to the Pacific coast and then back to Salt Lake City, for the reason it is cheaper to do so. The Arizona wool buyer first ships his wool to Los Angeles and then across the continent to Boston, because the latter rate is fixed to meet ocean competition. The railroads haul coal from the Pennsylvania mines to Chicago at a lower rate than they do to Jackson, Mich., 200 miles nearer the mine, and for the reason that Chicago is on Lake Michigan, which is connected by water with Lake Erie, upon which the city of Erie is situated, and the coal might be shipped by rail to Erie and thence by boat to Chicago. Water competition is the one sure power which compels low freight rates.

This principle is generally recognized by States and by the Nation. He who investigates with care will discover that the freight rate enters into the cost of practically everything of human use, and its effect upon articles of consumption is to increase the cost far in excess of any increase caused by tariff duties.

Centuries ago European Governments recognized the necessity of common carriers and treated them as public servants. The old common law of England, adopted by the United States, provides that the rates and regulations of common carriers shall be just and reasonable. To the end that they shall be such, statutes have been enacted, and in recent years railroad-rate legislation has been the most important of Federal and State enactments.

The problem of cheap transportation is still unsolved; but already water transportation is recognized as the prime factor in the solution.

The Great Lakes extend into the very heart of the United States. Tributary to them is the most fertile territory of our country. On them and within an hour's ride from them are found our largest and most prosperous industries.

The iron, copper, coal, tin, salt, and other minerals of Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Ohio, and western Pennsylvania would naturally find their way to markets over the Lakes if a deep waterway for ocean-going craft connected those Lakes with the Atlantic; the forest products of the great Middle Northwest could be floated to the ultimate consumer; railroads would have their termini on the inland seas, and to their waters could be carried the grain and other agricultural products for shipment to both shores of the Atlantic. Indeed, the Atlantic would be extended to Chicago and Duluth and a benefit to producers and shippers in the great Middle West, in excess of any other that has been suggested, would be extended. I can not easily overstate this benefit. Think of it, transportation for seagoing craft would be brought to within an hour of the center of population. At the docks of Duluth, Chicago, Port Arthur, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Buffalo, and Toronto could be seen ships flying the flags of England, Germany, Russia, and of every other maritime power of Europe. Cargoes could be loaded in bottoms at Lake ports bound directly for their foreign destination. The Interstate Commerce Commission would have no occasion to pass upon railroad rates from the Middle West to the Atlantic. Water competition would keep these rates reasonable.

But shipments from the Middle West and Northwest would not be the only ones benefited. Goods going into those regions from the East would not be charged with the present high freight rates. They would get the benefit of water competition.

There are other great benefits which would come from the establishment of this waterway. On the Lakes are some of the largest shipbuilding yards in the country. In them are constructed some of the largest ships afloat, and these yards could compete in construction with the seaboard yards, and such competition might be of great value to the Government and to the shipping interests on lakes and seas.

Session after session of Congress the country is notified of its dangerous lack of colliers for use with its gunboats in time of war, and yet our Great Lakes are covered with leviathans that could be used in case of need, and that without expense of building and maintaining by the Government in time of peace. How much better to spend $150,000,000 in a waterway intrinsically worth the money, for commerce, and at the same time furnish a way to get collier freighters to the sea in case of necessity, than to spend $150,000,000 for boats which will probably never be needed. This is no idle fancy. The lake boats may not be constructed as a modern naval architect would build a collier, but they would answer the purpose, and are such as are now used in time of war. Many of the lake boats at the close of the lake season could go down to the sea and engage in the coastwise traffic in the winter season, and thus work the year round. On the other hand, a larger field will be opened to our coast-serving boats, and if it be true that a lake-boat monopoly exists, or is being formed, competition will tend to destroy it.

To me this scheme opens a possibility for a merchant marine without subsidy or other similar device. This waterway would induce the building, manning, and operation of seagoing boats on the Great Lakes.

The St. Lawrence River, with its sources in the very industrial and commercial heart of the continent, leads in a most direct line to the great marts of Europe. It invites the business of both countries to embark upon its waters. Nature never appealed more eloquent with advantages and opportunities than she does to these two countries through this waterway to-day.

I can already hear the objections which will be urged by representatives from the Atlantic seaboard of the United States. Already they think they see Montreal enlarged into the metropolis of the western continent, while New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore contemplate their idle wharves and empty warehouses; but, Mr. President, they are victims of hallucinations; they are but seeing nightmares in their dreams.

A sufficiently developed Welland Canal and St. Lawrence River would but stimulate railroad facilities and railroad advantages, and a practical waterway sufficient for the needs of ocean traffic, extending from Duluth to the mouth of the St. Lawrence River, would be worth the cost to the people of the two countries, if but few additional boats sailed over the course. in the reduction of railroad rates and the additional railroad accommodations which would be furnished. This is one of the unquestioned lessons which such enterprises have taught the world.

But, Mr. President, believing, as I do, that this project would be for the good of the United States and Canada as a whole, I would still advocate it even if it should stop the phenomenal, nay, the somewhat dangerous, growth of our seaboard cities. But if great growth is the thing altogether lovely and most to be desired, what should we say of the possibilities in this regard which shall come to Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Milwaukee, Duluth, Chicago, and other cities as a result of this project?

As for me, sir, I would for the good of my country hasten the movement of the center of population westward into the neighborhood of our greatest natural resources, into the region where exist those somewhat latent forces which must shape and control the great destinies of ultimate America. But no disaster can come from this to any legitimate interest. It will stimulate growth and prosperity everywhere. In all prosperous times, in some seasons of all years, there is great complaint that traffic is retarded and great loss to business incurred by reason of insufficient shipping facilities. This plan would tend to relieve congestion by furnishing additional facilities and by inducing collateral railroad development.

I have suggested some of the benefits which would flow from a waterway such as I have proposed. I now desire, as briefly as may be, to discuss the feasibility of the plan, and in doing so I deeply sense the fact that I am not an engineer and that my utterances may be properly characterized as those of a novice. There are, however, some demonstrated facts, certain things in being, to which reference can be properly had and upon which I can draw for information, and thus, in a measure, and to that extent, relieve myself from the charge of speculation so long as the analogy is unquestioned.

One of these demonstrated facts is that a waterway for boats drawing not over 14 feet is already established and in operation on this proposed route now. Last year the total canal traffic of Canada was 42,990,608 tons, of which the Sault Ste. Marie Canal is credited with 36,395,687 tons, the Welland Canal with 2,326,290 tons, and the St. Lawrence canals with 2,760,752 tons, and the growth of this tonnage in late years has been most phenomenal. For instance, the total Canadian tonnage in 1901 was 5,665,259 tons; in 1905 it was 9,371,744; and in 1910 it was, as I have stated, 42,990,608 tons. Now, if boats of 14 feet draft can sail from Lake Erie to the Atlantic Ocean by means of canal and river improvement, is it fanciful to say that the largest boats after greater improvement can do the same?

In the first place, such a waterway as I propose must be practicable for the needs of navigation if it is to be undertaken. To be practicable, it must be so constructed and operated that boats may sail in reasonable safety, with proper dispatch, and under such international arrangements as will facilitate mutually the free and unnecessarily restricted commerce of both Canada and the United States.

The St. Lawrence River route has been selected, because it has sufficient water and takes, as I have stated, the most direct course to the great markets of Europe. Open-water sailing is greatly preferable to canal navigation. Greater speed is possible. Accidents are less imminent. The cost is materially less. Some canals with locks will be necessary to complete the project, but the fewer of these there are the more desirable and practicable the route.

I have stated that there already exists a waterway on this line for some boats. Canada alone has spent upon her locks and canals in the St. Lawrence, including the Cornwall Canal, and between Lakes Erie and Ontario about $97,000,000. Owing to the small dimensions of the Welland Canal and locks and of those in the St. Lawrence and to certain Canadian regulations as to lockages on Sunday, and so forth, comparatively few American boats use the St. Lawrence route, although the number is increasing. Last year 692 American vessels passed through the St. Lawrence Canal, or, rather, 692 trips were made by American vessels.

If the locks and canals in the St. Lawrence and between Lakes Erie and Ontario are enlarged sufficiently, it will be possible for the largest boats to pass through them. Fortunately, the fall of water from Lake Erie to Montreal, which makes canals and locks necessary, also engenders the greatest dynamic force to be found on the continent. These moving waters contain a power which, properly harnessed and controlled, could drive a majority of all the machines of our mighty industries. And power is coming more and more into demand. To utilize that power dams below the rapids will have to be constructed. These dams will check the flow and create pools of deeper water over what before were rocks dangerous to navigation. Is it chimerical to believe that much of the waters in the St. Lawrence, now impassable for ships, may be made navigable by dams constructed for the purpose of generating power?

There was pending before the Senate last session a proposition for a private corporation to build and operate such a dam at the Long Sault Rapids in the St. Lawrence, and the provisions in the proposed grant all had in view construction and operation in such a manner as to facilitate open water as well as lock navigation. And so valuable did the concessionaires regard this latent power in the waters that they are willing, not only to build their locks and dams so as to facilitate navigation, but they were willing to pay something per horsepower generated for this concession.

This suggests the probable fact that the power possibilities of the St. Lawrence can be made to pay for improving much of the rivers. I am informed that by proper dam construction practically all of the rapids in the river save one can be overcome in this way, and with little expense to either country.

How much of the improvement of the St. Lawrence can be secured through the development of its water power? Is it not of sufficient importance to empower and instruct the President to investigate and report upon?

The Welland Canal would need to be enlarged, or a new canal dug, and larger locks constructed. But no mechanical prohibitions intervene. Whatever improvements are made in furtherance of this project must and should be made through a joint understanding, if not through the joint operation, of Canada and the United States. The waters lie in both countries. The benefits would inure to both. The binational control of these waters may make it desirable that improvements made in waters lying wholly in United States territory should be made by the United States, and improvements similarly made in Canadian waters should be made by Canada. And if improvements are made by impounding waters, as they should be wherever possible, the benefits from power should inure to the country in whose territory the power site is located.

Improvements in boundary territory should be made by both countries and mutual power benefits should go to both.

The fees from lockages should be apportioned according to location and benefit, but they should be reasonable and uniform. If, however, it shall develop that private power companies will not be found to construct dams, which will contribute materially to the accomplishment of the plan, or, if the total cost to Canada should seem to her prohibitive, I believe an international agreement can be entered into whereby the United States can perform the work without embarrassment to Canada.

I am aware that there are canal projects now pending before the Ottawa Parliament, but none of them is as feasible as the international waterway which is here proposed. If this route lay all in Canada, no one in that country would consider the Georgian Bay-Ottawa River route, or any other, in preference to this one. This is a gigantic enterprise which is proposed, but it is in keeping with the spirit of modern enterprise, and with harmonious action on the part of these two great modern Nations it can be accomplished to the glory and immeasurable benefit of both.

It will cost much money, but its accomplishment will warrant the expenditure. How much it will cost I can hardly approximate, and yet we can find some information on the subject. In 1906, when President Taft was Secretary of War, a survey was made for the purpose of determining the cost of a 25-foot channel of sufficient width from Duluth and Chicago to Buffalo, and the total amount was $26,000,000, besides several millions to be expended in dredging some of the lake harbors to the 25-foot depth. This survey and estimate included improvement in the St. Marys River and locks costing $11,000,237; in the passage from Lake Huron to Detroit River, $2,334,180; in the Detroit River, $11,571,450; in Grays Reef passage from Lake Michigan into Lake Huron, $426,500; or, in all, $25,938,367.

Canada has, as I have stated, expended $97,000,000 on portions of this waterway. It may cost both United States and Canada, on the distance between Lake Erie and Montreal, $150,000,000 for a waterway of sufficient depth to accommodate seagoing vessels. This amount may be materially reduced by assistance from power-developing companies. It may cost more than this sum. But Canada is seriously considering a water route from the Lakes to Montreal through Georgian Bay and the Ottawa River; and another by canal from the southern part of Lake Huron across to Lake Erie, and from Lake Erie either through the enlarged Welland Canal or a new one across to Lake Ontario, thence down the St. Lawrence to near Ogdensburg, and from there by canal to the Ottawa River, and then down to the St. Lawrence.

There are too many canals in these schemes; too many obstacles to be overcome, it seems to me, and, besides, the course laid out by nature seems the reasonable one, and I believe it is possible for the two Nations to agree upon some system of improvement which will be mutually satisfactory and beneficial. Anyway, Mr. President, the project is so big with possibilities that it should be given the most serious thought and investigation by the two Nations which are, we hope, entering upon an era of good will and amity.

To me this is a greater proposition than the Panama Canal. It has within it potentialities of great proportions. Had time permitted I could have shown something of the mighty commerce which would be benefited by this deep waterway. Last year more than $700,000,000 worth of tonnage sailed down the Detroit River. More than 50,000,000 tons of freight passed through the Soo Locks. Much of this immense value and tonnage was destined for foreign trade. Suppose it could have been loaded into ships which would carry it without reloading to its European destination? Can you comprehend the saving to industry, the gain to producers? With such a waterway established, our grain and other agricultural products raised for foreign consumption would not have to pay the tolls of reshipment and excessive railroad rates, and the farmer would get the benefits. The copper and iron manufactured for the foreign trade would be turned out at the furnaces, smelters, and factories erected upon the Great Lakes—an arm of the sea.

Mr. President, this may be a dream, but some day the dream will come true. It may come in the distant future. But it will come. Impatient as its advocates may be for the hour of its consummation, they will not be discouraged. That it looks to the future for the realization of its hopes is no valid objection to any worthy cause.

Canadian reciprocity, with its attendant possibilities, must not be judged entirely by its present achievements, neither by those of the immediate to-morrow. It should be judged by its continent-wide outlook into the future. It is an earnest of that good day when these two nations of the same ancestry, possessed of the same hopes, and striving for the same high ideals, will have recognized the great truth that it is wasteful to industry and detrimental to social and moral progress to wage trade wars and a mistake to refuse or neglect to use those natural advantages which are pregnant with mutual benefits waiting to be delivered by international cooperation.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Michigan takes his seat, I should like to ask him if he has in his studies investigated in any way the route from New York via Lake Champlain and the St. Lawrence River to the West?

Mr. TOWNSEND. In 1896 the Government authorized the Secretary of War to investigate the proposition of a waterway all within the United States, or waters bounding the United States from the Great Lakes to the Hudson River. The route to which the Senator from Vermont refers was one of three routes investigated, and a voluminous report was made in July, 1897. The Army engineers reported adversely on all of the three propositions. It was thought that the expense, $200,000,000, would be too great, and besides, the particular route to which the Senator refers would include too much canal navigation. I am not quoting literally from that report, but that is the impression I have of it.

Mr. PAGE. But, Mr. President, if the canal to which the Senator has been referring, if the waterway down the St. Lawrence River is ever deepened so as to accommodate seagoing vessels, is it not true that the expense of connecting the St. Lawrence River with Lake Champlain will probably be very slight, and that Lake Champlain and the Hudson River together almost fill the gap between the St. Lawrence and New York City?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I quite agree with the Senator from Vermont that, if this scheme of developing the St. Lawrence River is carried out, the additional plan of connecting the St. Lawrence with Lake Champlain will be easy of accomplishment; and I have no doubt that, in the interest of the great State of New York and of the great East in fact, such a scheme would be completed.

Mr. PAGE. I have been very much interested in what the Senator from Michigan has said with reference to this waterway, but I could not allow the opportunity to pass without suggesting that the project having been completed as he would complete it, so far as expense is concerned, from Lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence River—and he will bear in mind that the Richelieu River is the outlet of Lake Champlain, and passes into the St. Lawrence River—is a very feasible project. It only remains to build from the lower end of Lake Champlain to the Hudson River at Troy or Albany, and that, I suppose, is less than a hundred miles——

Mr. TOWNSEND. And some work has been done on it. The Champlain Canal covers part of the distance.

Mr. PAGE. And there is already a canal there. It seems to me that the tonnage from New York to the West by way of this waterway would approach very nearly that of the foreign traffic to which the Senator has called attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to the bill to be offered as in Committee of the Whole?

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to be offered to the bill as in Committee of the Whole? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the title of the bill, and was interrupted by,

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Out of order, I ask leave to offer an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie upon the table.

If there are no further amendments to be offered to the pending bill as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The Secretary read the title of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy unnecessarily the time of the Senate in regard to this measure, but before it shall finally be voted upon I desire to submit a few remarks.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely ask for information: Is the bill in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been reported to the Senate, and it is now in the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. When was it reported to the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A very few moments ago. It was the last business that was done.

Mr. NELSON. I was not aware of that. The bill was called up and the action was rather sudden. I do not think that is right.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am certain that there was not one Senator in five who had the slightest idea that such action had been taken with this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated the question distinctly; and after the Chair had made the statement, he waited. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] asked recognition from the Chair. It was then granted. After the Senator from Minnesota had offered his amendment, the Chair again stated the question, and no Senator then spoke. The Secretary reported the bill to the Senate, and the Chair then announced that the bill was in the Senate, whereupon the Chair recognized the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I think there is no criticism of the Chair, but I think it was not the desire of the Senate that the bill should leave the Committee of the Whole; and, if it is in order, I ask that the bill be recommitted to the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request that the bill be returned to the Senate as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. PENROSE. I object.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I move that the bill be returned to the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves that the bill be returned to the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, in charge of the bill, to consent to that. I am quite sure Senators did not understand the matter. They were inattentive. It was not the fault of the Chair, but the fault of the Senate. I am sure very few understood what was going on at the moment, and I hardly think, as a friend of the bill, that substantial progress can be made by that course, although I leave it to the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has had great experience.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to echo the utterance of the Senator from Missouri. I do not think it is consistent with the usages of the Senate to insist upon anything which has been done through inadvertence. I quite agree to the fact that there is no possible criticism upon the Chair. The facts are exactly, and the announcements were made exactly, as stated by the Chair, and I so understood them at the time they were made; but I was none the less conscious of the fact that the Senate at large did not know that the announcement was being made. There is a universal practice in the Senate, whenever anything has been done by inadvertence, that it should not be insisted upon; and, as a friend of the bill, I also join in the request of the Senator from Missouri to the Senator from Pennsylvania to consent that the request be acceded to upon the ground that it was not the deliberate act of the Senate and not the intention of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not want to take any unfair advantage of the Senate or of any individual Senator in the consideration of this bill, but it seems to me that a little fair treatment toward this measure is justly to be expected. The Senate this morning refused to fix a date for a vote, and now, apparently, no one is willing to proceed with a discussion of the measure. This will not be the only time that Senators will be caught napping if they are not prepared to go on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. We do not want to catch anybody napping in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think anybody was caught napping.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not mean to say, from my point of view, that anybody was caught napping, but the allegation of Senators who wish this action reconsidered is that they were caught in a condition when they were not giving careful attention to legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is mistaken. I did not say that.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I misapprehended the position of the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I said, evidently the Senate did not desire that the bill should be reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate; and I think that will be made manifest if a roll call on my motion is rendered necessary.

Mr. PENROSE. The question was put deliberately by the Chair, and it was very evident that none of the Senators interested in opposing this measure were giving sufficient attention to the proceedings of the Senate to know what was going on or what would be done. I am perfectly willing to withdraw my objection and let the bill go back to the Committee of the Whole, but I hope that the Senate will show some appreciation of the course and proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania withdraws his objection. If there be no further objection, the bill will be considered as again in Committee of the Whole. No other objection is heard. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is recognized.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as the basis of some remarks I expect to make later upon this bill, I desire to put into the RECORD something in the nature of historic facts with reference to reciprocity and the position of the party of which I am a humble member upon this important subject.

My early training and environment lead me to desire to talk to a text, and I read as a text to-day the following:

The western farmer's instinct is wiser than Mr. Gladstone's philosophy. The farmer knows that the larger the home market the better his prices, and that as his home market is narrowed his prices fall.

Everyone will recognize that this is a statement made by Mr. Blaine in his famous controversy with Mr. Gladstone upon the question of protection or free trade. No one in his day ever doubted the ability of Mr. Blaine to deal with this subject. He was a profound student, a brave and fearless defender of his faith at all times and against all comers. Along the same line, I call attention to a statement made by the late Speaker Reed:

If we propose to abandon any industries, we had better not let it be the agricultural industries. Between the Atlantic and Pacific stretch vast regions still untilled. The next victory of protection should be there.

Our system of protection is not for manufacturers alone. It is for farmers also. Whoever deprives our farmers of all the American market they can occupy is false to his principles and must meet with defeat, or the system must be surrendered which proclaims that American markets are first of all for American citizens, who are engaged in developing the country we already have.

No one will question an authority so high upon the subject under discussion. Mr. Reed, had he been permitted to speak upon this occasion, could not have spoken more trenchantly and effectively than he did in almost the last utterance which he made upon the subject of protection. The leader of his party in his day, an intellectual giant, need I go further in justification of my position as a Republican in the unpleasant duty of opposing this measure? I call attention particularly to this sentence:

Between the Atlantic and Pacific stretch vast regions still untilled.

There is to-day, according to the statistics furnished us by the Bureau of Statistics, one-half of the agricultural lands of the United States in private ownership that are not under cultivation. There are outside of the lands which are in private ownership easily 75,000,000 acres of public lands that are as well fitted for agricultural purposes as those which are now under cultivation. In other words, there are millions of acres of land well fitted to produce and with proper encouragement would be reduced to cultivation and which it would seem it would be the part of wisdom upon the part of the American people to encourage to be placed under cultivation. Why deal with the foreigner with millions of untilled acres at home, which, if tilled, would not only bring more products to the market, but more taxes to the Treasury and thus lessen the burdens of all?

I read also a statement from another source—politically speaking:

In the year 1832, when the question was under consideration in the Senate, Mr. Benton, speaking on Mr. Clay's tariff resolution, called attention to the fact that our domestic manufacturers, having a high tariff on their fabrics, were producing many from raw material from foreign countries, and showed that our flax fabrics were from foreign flax, and he cited wool, hemp, indigo, hides, and furs, of which five articles we had imported in six years $25,000,000. Commenting on the fact, he observed:

"This immense sum has been paid to foreigners instead of to American citizens."

Among other things he said:

"The farmers and planters of the United States should be admitted into the benefits of the American system and secured in the domestic supply of the raw material to our manufacturers. I hope for this much for the farmers and for the honor of the system, for nothing can be more absurd than to erect domestic manufactures upon foreign (raw) material; nothing more contradictory than to predicate independence for goods upon dependence for materials to make them of; nothing more iniquitous than to give to the manufacturers the home market of goods and not to give the farmers the home market of raw materials."

Mr. Jackson, in one of his messages to Congress, used this language:

The agricultural interest is so essentially connected with every other and so superior in importance to them all that it is scarcely necessary to invite to it your particular attention. It is principally as manufactures and commerce tend to increase the value of agricultural products and to extend their application to the wants and comforts of society that they deserve the fostering care of government.

These quotations from the opposition party will serve also to remind how far both parties are wandering from the wholesome political principles of other days, days when men realized that the first care and duty of the statesman and the patriot was to look well to the producing classes—the laborer, the miner, the farmer.

These excerpts from distinguished leaders of those times are quoted with a view of making them applicable later in the discussion.

We had a treaty with Canada in 1854. It remained in force until about 1865. It was very similar to the treaty now under consideration. In some respects it was better. But it was similar in that it dealt alone with natural products of the farm, similar in that it opened our markets to the agriculturist of the Dominion.

This treaty was unsatisfactory from the day it was signed until it was repealed. It proved to be greatly to the detriment of the American farmer and American interests, and very greatly to the advantage of the Canadian interests and the Canadian farmers. In this connection, I call attention to an editorial from the New York Tribune, under date of December 15, 1864, and about the time that this treaty was being abrogated, written by Mr. Greeley, wherein he says, among other things:

The treaty was a swindle from top to bottom, such as would be a reciprocal contract to exchange coals between Newcastle and Paris—it gave Canada the free use of our markets in which to sell her enormous agricultural products. * * * It gave Canada the use of our markets and short highways to the Atlantic for literally nothing. * * * The treaty was a contrivance to build up an enormous empire on our flank by the untaxed use of our high-priced markets.

The editorial is an extensive one, and well worth study and consideration.

I also call attention to a leading editorial from the Chicago Tribune, under date of December 21, 1864, at the time that this treaty was under discussion for abrogation. After calling attention to some matters which had been advanced as an argument in favor of continuing the treaty, the editorial continues:

On the other hand, the treaty enables Canada to compete with our own people in the lumber trade to the great disadvantage of our northwestern lumber districts, and in the coarse grains—oats, barley, etc.—it enables Canada to compete with our western farmers and dealers in the eastern markets. Thus much for our export trade. Our import trade, under the treaty, is inconsiderable. The whole amount of merchandise received at the port of Chicago under the treaty in 1862 was but $45,763, of which $16,640 was brought in foreign vessels. In 1863 the trade was $58,238, of which $27,877 was brought in foreign vessels.

When we enlarge our inquiry into the effects of this treaty to the whole country, it is undeniable that in some respects it is very far from being reciprocal, and that it has vastly benefited Canada at the expense of the United States. The Canadian statesman and the Canadian press freely admit that it has so built up the Canadian people as to put an end to the former disposition of many of them for annexation, and as one of the members of Parliament, Hon. Isaac Buchanan, expresses it, "Has left the Canadian farmer nothing to envy in the condition of the American farmer." He further says, "And but for the most obvious providences, among which is the obtaining our reciprocity treaty with the United States, the disruption of the empire would have been endangered before now." The inference is that a repeal of the treaty would induce a return to their former feeling of dependence upon us and desire for annexation. We might cite the whole Canadian press in proof of the fact that the treaty has built up Canada, but we prefer the dryer, more incontrovertible statistics which prove that the profits which result from the treaty are all on the Canadian side, like the tracks before the lion's den, all going in, none coming out.

I call attention here to the fact that this is from a paper which was then friendly to reciprocity, and which, I understand, is still friendly to reciprocity, but it has more company now than it had then.

In the four years from 1850 to 1853, inclusive, the importations free of duty from Canada to the United States were $4,107,392, while the importations paying duty were $15,200,634, or nearly four times greater. But the importations free of duty after the treaty took effect in four years from 1856 to 1859, inclusive, were $59,419,925, and those subject to duty had fallen off in the same time to $2,150,394, or only 1 in 28.

Now, while the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] was greatly exhilerated over the proposition of the friendlier relations which would arise between Canada and the United States and the augmenting of the trade between those two countries, if we are to judge the future in the light of past experience we shall find that Canada, as every other nation, will seek at all times to build up itself and will take advantage of the reciprocity agreement to aggrandize and accentuate its differences rather than to curtail them in accordance with the spirit of reciprocity.

This is not reciprocity, but a clear gain to the Canadas. In 1858, when the United States collected duties only on $313,953 in value of Canadian productions, those of American labor upon which duties were paid in Canada amounted to $4,524,503. During 1856–1857–1858 the amount of American industry taxed in Canada was $18,294,293, more than that of Canadian production taxed in this country. Their trade has almost ceased to be a source of revenue to us, while from our trade they draw their custom contributions.

In 1856 we imported from Canada free $17,810,684 in merchandise. Had it been subject to the usual revenue it would have paid us some four millions. In the first four years after the treaty came into operation we received of the list of articles named in the treaty $28,771,691 in value more than Canada received from us, paying for them, of course, in gold, exchange, or duty-paying products. These figures all go to show that the treaty makes Canada the seller and we the buyer, while what we have to sell she does not buy. This causes a drain of coin, of which we paid them in 1862 $2,530,000, and in 1863 $3,502,180. Indeed, it is estimated that in gold or its equivalent we export, as the effects of the treaty, $10,000,000 annually to pay for agricultural production, all of which the Northwest can far more profitably supply.

It will be remembered that the treaty refers to raw material and natural products alone, the very articles for which Canada and the Western States need a market, while manufactured goods, which might restore the balance if allowed to be exported from the Eastern States, are not covered by the treaty. On the contrary, since the treaty was passed, the Canadians have shut these out by levying ad valorem duties on all imports which, so long as English manufacturers can produce an article at less cost than the American, excludes the latter. These and similar arguments are having their effect in the mind of the majority of the people of this country. It is argued that while there is a possible gain to one or two agricultural interests, yet on the whole the farmers of Canada are being enriched at the expense of our own. We feel that as in and by this treaty we have given Canada her recent prosperity, so, by the right of rescinding it, we hold that prosperity still in our hands. When in return for the advantage we have thus conferred we find that substantial benefits are not even repaid with common good will, but to the very independence to which we have contributed is displayed in siding with our national enemies, it is not at all remarkable that even among the friends of the reciprocity treaty many are inquiring closely into the relative profits of the bargain we have made, or are disinterested, and on purely national grounds demanding that, whether profitable to some of us or not, it must be terminated.

This is an editorial, written, it seems to me, dispassionately, at a time when the actual experience was with us and based upon facts and figures which are elsewhere sustained and verified.

We have throughout the great western country and the great Northwest the capacity to do what Canada is now invited to do, and that is to supply the home market with the natural products. The simple question is, Shall we be turned aside after building up the eastern market for a foreigner? Mr. President, if there is one cardinal principle in the protective system more permanent and distinctive than all others it is that the American market place belongs to the American producer so long as he is able to supply that market. With one-half of the agricultural lands in the United States untilled, with millions of acres of public lands yet to be cultivated, what reason is there for American statesmanship to turn from the encouragement of the American farmer to produce and fill the American market place, to barter and trade with the foreign producer? Why turn the settler's face toward Canada instead of the unsettled lands of our own?

It is an acknowledged fact that within the last 8 or 10 years the prices upon the American farm have been augmented to such an extent as to bring about, if not a return of those who have left, a retardation of the movement from the farm to the city, and hundreds and thousands of acres of lands which had been abandoned from 1870 to 1890 have been reclaimed in these different States and are to-day entering upon an era of cultivation and production.

There is one of the great States in this Union, which I might mention if necessary, that in 1900 had 20,000 farms advertised for sale, and farms in one of the great rich valleys of the State which had sold for $150 an acre were selling for $20 and $30 and $40 an acre.

It is a fact, evidenced by statistics which no one, I apprehend, will controvert, that within the last five years hundreds and thousands of acres of those abandoned farms have gone back under cultivation, and the price which was reduced from $30 to $40 has been increased from $75 to $80 and $100 an acre.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask if the Senator from Idaho insists that the occupation of those farms came through the process of the tariff? Were not those farms occupied in spite of the tariff? The fact is, sir, that the multiplied immigration has occupied those farms, and the zenith has not yet been reached. Thousands of farms are still vacant to-day throughout the State of Connecticut and many other portions of our Union.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I yield, but I should like to answer the Senator from New Jersey, because he asked me a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think you ought to answer him.

Mr. BORAH. I think that of course the farm would be occupied regardless of the tariff. But there can be no doubt, I presume, that the extent of the occupancy and the extent of agriculture will be somewhat controlled by the price which the farmer realizes for his products.

It is quite true, as was said so well by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] the other day, that a tariff will not close up a farm in the sense that it will close up a manufacturing establishment, because the farm is a home. The farmer must fight not only for material success, but he must fight for his home. But it makes the condition severer and harder for men to stay there, and gradually they work themselves away from the farm into the city, where they can secure a competency.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. What——

Mr. BORAH. I know that my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, is a farmer, but he is not our kind of a farmer. He has been speaking here in the interest of the American farmer and as a farmer for some days. I could not believe that the distinguished-looking gentleman, with his gold spectacles and his Hyperion curl, was indeed a farmer, so I began to investigate. I found that my friend about 18 or 20 years ago had a farm of 160 acres down in his State of New Jersey, and that he farmed it for awhile and played politics some. About 10 or 15 years afterwards a great manufacturing town, built up by manufacturing, grew to his farm, and he cut up his farm into little lots and built 75 or 100 houses upon them, and sold or rented the houses and lots and came to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to say to the Senate that the diagnosis of the Senator from Idaho is fairly correct. I want to say further that I have lived on a farm all my life, and until the past three years I have been an active farmer and could cradle a field of rye equal to any other gentleman in this body. Further, in answer to the charge of the distinguished Senator that I built houses, I say yes; and I built them with unprotected American labor. My laborers were in competition with the open markets of the world, competing with the pauper labor that you protectionists have been telling us so much of. And let me say that while I built about 75 houses, when I had built about 5 houses I found had it not been for the iniquitous and accursed system of this intolerable tariff I could have built 3 more houses with the same money. Take the tariff off of the hardware and the glass and the other things that enter into house construction and I could have built 5 where I built 3.

I will say to you that my carpenters were paid under the nonprotective system, open to the pauper markets of the world, $3.50 per day; my masons were paid $4.50 per day; my hod carriers, $2.50; and my painters, $3.50.

Now let me ask, since the distinguished Senator has opened up this question——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let me ask the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. As the Senator has opened up this question——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment, until the Chair ascertains whether the Senator from Idaho will further yield. He has indicated that he did not desire to yield further. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. My friend——

Mr. BORAH. I dislike not to yield, but I should like for the Senator to confine himself to a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The distinguished Senator has opened the door. I want to show you, my distinguished friend from Idaho, the contrary side of the protected industry. My laborers receive $3.50, $4, and $5 per day in the open markets of the world. In mills 8 miles from my home—in factories, mills, and workshops protected to the zenith under the process of the hateful tariff—I find American white women and girls working in woolen mills and factories under the munificent tariff system for 85 cents and 90 cents a day.

Turn 12 miles in the other direction to Paterson and Passaic and see the miserable, measley pittance that white women under the protective system get, until women get scarcely money enough to hold body and soul together. Ah, God knows you are welcome to the glories of the protective system that has made paupers on one side and millionaires beyond the dream of avarice on the other.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, suffice it to say that I am still here. I have great sympathy with the kind of farmers the Senator from New Jersey represents—a man seventy-five times a landlord and perhaps many times a millionaire——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; I plead not guilty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey will address the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. I can understand precisely how it is that at least one farmer got into the American Senate. But, Mr. President, it is evident from the statement of the Senator from New Jersey that under this iniquitous tariff system he has prospered well. No one can certainly complain of the success which he has had. New Jersey, of all the States in the Union, has received most benefit from the protective tariff system. That is the reason, Mr. President, why a farmer in the well-protected State of New Jersey can come in here as a Senator, many times a landlord, while the farmers in other parts of the country not so well protected, farther from the market, must be content with what feeble representation they have.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment, until the Senator from Idaho indicates that he will yield. Does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to answer. When the Senator says that I am a hundred times a millionaire, I tell you I plead not guilty; but I want——

Mr. BORAH. I was judging from his appearance only. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. My appearance deceived you. If you want to get the truth, you can turn my pockets inside out. I want to say, in anwser to the distinguished Senator, I am proud of the fact that I am the first Senator from the little Commonwealth of New Jersey who was elected by the vote of the people, and not a sou marqué was expended in my political campaign.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was rather a small vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Never mind; I got all the votes that were there for me.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was a very small proportion.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I did not desire to call in question the election of the Senator. I am glad that he is here, the Senate would be a dull place without my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. President, I want to call attention now to some further facts with reference to the treaty of 1854 to 1865. I have said that the Canadian reciprocity agreement of 1854 to 1865 was unsatisfactory; that it proved to be beneficial to Canada and greatly to the detriment of the United States.

I want to read a few extracts from a report made to the Secretary of the Treasury in 1860, by Hon. Israel T. Hatch, after a pretty thorough investigation.

I know, Mr. President, that these things will seem dull and uninteresting, but they are the things which tell the effect of such a measure as we are now proposing to enact, and they represent the actual workings of that which in theory is supposed to be quite different.

Familiar as the public mind must have been made with the principles which finally produced this treaty by these and similar almost authoritative expressions of opinion, brought home at intervals as these ideas must have been to the legislation and diplomacy of the country, it is not surprising that this practical but limited experiment in substantial free trade was attempted. The leading idea of the treaty itself was to permit the introduction of the products of one country into the other free of duty, and consequent reciprocal benefits were expected to follow to both. The various colonies included in its provisions were left to regulate their own tariffs, and each colonial power can annul its honorary obligations without reference to its sister Provinces or the engagements of the Empire. No statesmanship could, however, fortell the workings of the treaty or had a right to anticipate legislation adverse to its spirit. Correct in principle as the treaty itself was, the perversion of its spirit and the disregard of its substance on the part of Canada have produced results it is the province of this report to exhibit.

The conduct of the Canadian Government is not brought forward for the purpose of criticizing, but for the purpose of explaining that which we may anticipate will happen again; that the Canadian Government, using the reciprocity agreement as a basis, will serve its individual and selfish purposes as best it may; and this delightful and inspiring doctrine of the brotherhood of man and sisterhood of woman will have very little to do when Canada comes to apply the proposition of building up her great industries. We will still be in severe competition with the great nation upon the north, and whatever advantage is given to that nation by reason of the reciprocity agreement will be taken and utilized to aggrandize its forces and its ability to grow rather than an incentive to return a reciprocal favor to the United States.

I call attention to a table found upon page 12 of this report, which explains itself:

INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF FREE GOODS IMPORTED FROM CANADA.

The market change in the amount of free goods imported from Canada into the United States since the treaty is shown in the following table, exhibiting also in contrast the importations from the same Province, and subject to duty, from June 30, 1850, to July 1, 1859:

Importations to the United States from Canada.

Years.	Free of duty.	Subject to duty.
1850	$636,454	$3,649,016
1851	1,529,085	3,426,786
1852	761,571	3,828,398
1853	1,179,682	4,098,434
1854	380,041	6,341,498
1855	6,876,496	5,305,818
1856	16,847,822	640,375
1857	17,600,737	691,097
1858	11,267,618	313,953
1859	13,703,748	504,969
Total	70,733,854	28,800,344

I quote further from the report:

The treaty was conceived in the theories of free trade and in harmony with the progress and civilization of the age. It was a step forward in political science. American legislation had been characterized by an extraordinary liberality to a foreign neighbor, placing her lines of transportation upon an equality with our own and her merchants upon an equality with our own in receiving foreign merchandise in bond. We conceded commercial freedom upon all their products of agriculture, the forest, and the mine, and they have either closed their markets against the chief products that we could sell to them or exacted a large duty on admission into their markets.

YEARLY CHANGES AND INCREASED DUTIES IN CANADIAN TARIFFS.

From time to time Canadian duties have been increased since the ratification of the treaty, and during the last five years the following duties have been exacted on the declared value of various chief articles of consumption:

Articles.	1855	1856	1857	1858	1859
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Molasses	16	11	11	18	30
Sugar, refined	32	28	25	26½	40
Sugar, other	27½	20	17½	21	30
Boots and shoes	12½	14½	20	21	25
Harness	12½	17	20	21	25
Cotton goods	12½	13½	15	15	20
Iron goods	12½	18½	15	16	20
Silk goods	12½	13½	15	17	20
Wool goods	12½	14	15	18	20

Every year a new tariff has been enacted, and each of them has inflicted higher duties upon the chief productions of American labor. These duties are so adjusted as to fall most heavily upon the products of our citizens.

TARIFF TO EXCLUDE THE MANUFACTURES AND COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The tariff of 1859 was avowedly based upon an isolating and exclusive policy. It was supported on this ground alike by ministerial organs of the press, by petitions in its favor, and by members of the colonial Parliament. After securing our free market for all Canadian productions, its advocates argued that it was the interest of Canadians to become independent of all other countries, and to employ their own ships and their own people, thus "keeping in the country all that is now paid to the United States."

I also call attention to some of the language used in debate upon the abrogation of this treaty.

Mr. Pike, in the House, said:

I confess I am impatient of delay. I desire this treaty to draw its last breath as soon as possible. Had it much longer to live in order to die a natural death, if that be not paradoxical, I should be disposed to use violence and destroy a life which, in my judgment, has been productive of so much injury. It was a creature of mistaken views and of expectations which had no basis in fact. Its workings have been a continuous and protracted disappointment. It has achieved no considerable result which was predicted for it, and I ask the attention of the House for a short time while I exhibit its utter failure in all particulars which should render a commercial arrangement with a foreign country desirable to us.

I can tell him who did make the treaty. It was the Canadian Government, and Canadian money circulating freely here in Washington, lubricating the official channels through which the treaty and accompanying laws had to pass. It may be that the eastern manufacturers assisted them. If so, they got badly cheated, as the diminished exports of manufactures plainly prove.

I know the manufacturers had large expectations from the treaty. They reckoned upon getting raw material cheaper from the Provinces. They thought they could support their operatives at less expense with the potatoes, wood, and lumber of the Provinces than if they were obliged to obtain those articles from Maine; and while doing this they reckoned upon adding largely to their sales. But in this they were mistaken. They lost more in the falling off of customers than they gained by cheapening what they bought. The fact that after the treaty went into operation our exports to the Provinces fell off settled this conclusively. Instead of an increase of export of manufactures which should correspond with the increase of imports and the large increase of population on both sides of the line, the export of manufactures fell off largely. I do not propose to go into detail of this. Two years since I had the honor to present to the House resolutions adopted by the legislature of my State condemnatory of this treaty, and I took occasion at that time to give the statistics connected with the whole trade with the Provinces, and particularly the export of manufactures since the date of the treaty.

* * * * * * *

In his letter sent in here a few days since I find a table giving the values of certain manufactures exported to Canada for five years, from 1858–59 to 1862–63. The results as given are instructive. The years end July 1 in each year:

1861	3,501,642
1862	2,596,930
1863	1,510,802

I commend the table to manufacturers.

* * * * * * *

It was supposed that as this looked toward free trade, commerce would be largely benefited. Shipbuilders and shipowners were, for that reason, in favor of the treaty. But it was of no manner of benefit to the shipowners. The whole increase of provincial trade comes to us in provincial bottoms. I know that in my own State, in a profitable little eddy of provincial trade, there are those willing to foster the treaty at the expense of the whole country, and they talk of this treaty as benefiting commerce.

I now call the attention of the House to a serious loss of revenue which the Government sustains every day during the continuance of the treaty. It can not be estimated at less than $10,000,000 per annum.

When the treaty went into operation we were collecting about $1,300,000 of duties on imports from the Provinces. Since then we have not received enough to pay the salaries of officials along the lines. We should restore these duties, and, following the Canadian example, add to them largely.

The import from the Provinces is over twenty millions annually, and could well bear a taxation of $3,000,000 by means of a tariff which would have the effect to throw a portion of its own burdens upon the foreign producer.

John Sherman, in the Senate, used this language:

When the reciprocity treaty was adopted in 1855, there was then a state of things existing along the border which induced both parties to cultivate kindly relations and the exchange of commodities between them. I have no doubt that Great Britain got a great deal the best of the bargain, especially in the schedule of articles named which should be exchanged free of duty. The treaty has operated from the beginning against our interests; and it can be plainly demonstrated by the tables which are furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury that from the beginning our trade has fallen off and theirs increased, comparatively.

I think even a cursory examination of the workings of a similar treaty from 1854 to 1865 will justify every opposition which has been made to this measure. It built up the Canadian agricultural interests and the Canadian farmer to the detriment of the American farmer. On the other hand, it did not compensate the United States for this loss to the American farmer in any manner whatever. The American manufacturer soon learned that he lost more in his sales to the American farmer, who was injured and unable to buy, than he gained in his sales to the Canadian farmer.

Mr. President, since the abrogation of the Canadian treaty in 1865 we have many times been approached by that country for similar agreements, but always for a reciprocal trade in farm or natural products alone. So far as I am advised, there has never been any effort upon the part of the Canadian Government to secure any other kind of a reciprocal trade agreement.

Premier Laurier said, in the first interview made after this agreement was proposed:

The Dominion Government may find it possible to have some measure of reciprocal trade with her southern neighbor to the benefit of the farmer who asks for it without injuring the manufacturers who oppose it.

I did not suppose at the time I first read that interview he would be able to accomplish what he desired to accomplish. I have since changed my opinion. In a later interview, Mr. Laurier says:

Our negotiators would not consent to any reciprocity in manufactured products, but insisted on limiting this agreement simply to such manufactured products as agricultural implements. Although it was part of our policy to obtain reciprocity with the United States, we have acted carefully in so doing, and have not injured any industry.

In other words, it is the view of the premier, perhaps the ablest diplomat upon the American Continent, that without injuring any industry in Canada, without in any way materially injuring the growth of that country in its industrial development, they have, nevertheless, opened the market of 90,000,000 people to the great farming interests in Canada. They have accomplished precisely what they designed to accomplish. I wait now with some degree of interest to have any friend of this measure inform me what it was that we received from Canada in consideration of turning the American market place over to the Canadian producer. What benefit does this agreement give us? Wherein has Canada traded us any reciprocal thing for that which we have given to Canada in the nature of our farm products? Give me one definite, concrete proposition. Do not lead me away into sophomoric effusions about one language, one blood, and the brotherhood of man, but in this cold business deal, which Canada drove home with so much business selfishness, tell me what we got out of it. What we got, sir, was a deal between the Canadian farmer and our eastern manufacturer, to give the eastern manufacturer cheaper raw material—a clear, cold-blooded discrimination against the American farmer.

Although Canada, as I have said, has been knocking at our door from 1865 until now for the purpose of securing this kind of an agreement, never until this agreement was submitted has the party of which I am an humble member for a single moment entertained the proposition. On the other hand, it has repeatedly denounced it.

Not only that, Mr. President, but in every campaign which the Republican Party has made from 1864 until now we have pledged our honor to the American farmer that no such deal would be made. If there is anyone who can point me to a line, to a letter, to a declaration upon the part of any Republican leader, in any platform, in any declaration of anyone having authority to speak for the Republican Party, in support of this kind of an agreement in the party organization or by the organization, he will be able to find what industry upon my part has been unable to find.

Listen to what Mr. Blaine said to Mr. Harrison. In 1891 Mr. Blaine wrote to President Harrison as follows:

It is of the highest possible importance, in my view, that there be no treaty of reciprocity with Canada. They aim at natural products, to get all the products of the farm on us in exchange for heaven knows what. It would be considered a betrayal of the agricultural interests. The fact is, we do not want any intercourse with Canada except through the medium of a tariff.

It will be noticed, Mr. President, when those who speak of this measure as a betrayal of our agricultural interests that they are using language long ago justified by our greatest leaders, language which has been shouted from every Republican platform in the United States.

In 1891 the distinguished leader of the Republican organization, in his letter to Mr. Harrison, said they desire our market place in return for heaven knows what, and that any such arrangement would be considered as what? As a betrayal of the American farmer. We have never as a party in any platform repudiated his severe condemnation.

During the consideration of the Wilson bill the subject of freer trade relations with Canada was a matter of much discussion, and one of the attacks which the Republican leaders, including the distinguished gentleman who now presides over the Senate, made upon that bill was because it attempted to do what we are attempting to do to-day, to make a free list which should prevail and obtain between Canada and the United States. It was not only denounced by every single Republican leader having to do with the formation and discussion of that bill, but we went into the campaign following the enactment of that measure and went into the agricultural States and pledged the American farmer that upon its return to power the Republican Party would repeal that law, and upon that solemn pledge made to the farmers of this country the Republican Party was returned to power. Never was a clearer pledge made to voters and never were voters more loyal to party.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 28, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

WEDNESDAY, June 28, 1911.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 117, A) memorializing Congress, in enacting cold-storage legislation, not to limit the time during which said dairy products can be stored to less than one year.

Whereas Wisconsin is the leading dairy State in the Union, and its farmers are vitally interested in everything pertaining to that industry, having over $5,000,000 invested in buildings and equipments, and $55,000,000 in cows and other equipment necessary to carry on the dairy industry; and

Whereas if such legislation is enacted the farmers of Wisconsin, who have large amounts of money invested in the dairy business, will have their market destroyed, owing to the fact that a large proportion of their products is made in a few months of the year, and if said legislation is enacted the market for butter will be destroyed, with a consequent lessening of production resulting in a shortage and too high a price in winter; and

Whereas it has been proven that butter held in cold storage is not detrimental to the health of the consumer: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States, in enacting cold-storage legislation, not to limit the time during which said dairy products can be stored to less than one year.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I understand perfectly that this is not an inspiring atmosphere in which to speak. There are a certain number of Senators who seem to sit in silent, if not sullen, submission to a higher power, who are not interested in the discussion of this subject. There are a certain number of Senators who seem to me to be peering through the mists of the future in order to satisfy themselves with respect to the opinion which the people of the country will hold next year of the drama that is now in progress in the Senate of the United States, and they are not deeply interested in the discussion of the matters which arise upon this bill. To me, therefore, it has become rather a duty than a pleasure to debate the questions with which we are confronted.

In order, Mr. President, that I may establish a beginning, I send to the Secretary's desk and ask that there shall be read the extracts that are attached to the paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Washington Star, June 24, 1911.]

WILL VETO AMENDMENTS—PRESIDENT ANNOUNCES DETERMINATION TO PREVENT CHANGE IN RECIPROCITY TREATY.

In a long-distance telephone conversation with Senators to-day President Taft repeated his determination to veto the Canadian reciprocity bill in case any amendment is added.

Senators accept the President's ultimatum as applicable to modifications which might be made at the instance of Republicans as well as Democrats, and say that it would have the effect of preventing any agreement on amendments for tariff changes which might be acceptable to both insurgents and regular Republicans.

POINT RAISED BY FARMERS.

Many Senators have received telegrams and letters announcing a purpose on the part of the farmers to test the constitutionality of the proposed reciprocity law if it receives less than a two-thirds majority in the Senate. This position is taken on the ground that as the bill carries into effect the provisions of a treaty it should receive the vote in the Senate necessary to render a treaty effective.

The friends of the measure do not concede the point, but they are claiming the two-thirds.

[Washington Times, June 24, 1911.]

SENATE MINORITY LEADERS TO PLAN COURSE ON TARIFF—STONE SAYS HIS PARTY WILL FIGHT FOR UNAMENDED RECIPROCITY.

Senate Democratic leaders said to-day they expected an early conference of Democratic Senators to devise a program on reciprocity and tariff. They said the time had not been fixed, but that this would be the practicable way to arrive at an understanding. That the outcome will be decision to pass the reciprocity agreement without change is practically certain.

Senator STONE, of Missouri, who will lead the Democratic fight for reciprocity, was even more emphatic than ever to-day in declaring the agreement must not be amended.

MUST GO AS IT IS.

"It must be passed without the crossing of a 't' or the dotting of an 'i,'" said Senator STONE. "Most of our side feel that way about it. After that is done we can turn our attention to other tariff matters."

He added that what was done in way of revision depended on whether the insurgent Republicans would cooperate.

Asked about the length of the session, he said adjournment appeared about like an object looked at from the big end of a spyglass, extremely remote.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know whether the statements contained in these extracts from two reputable newspapers are true or false. I do know, however, that they find great corroboration in everything that is said and in everything that is printed concerning the work in which we are now engaged. It must be conceded that a minority of the Republican Senators, most of whom have hitherto advocated the high and, in many instances, the indefensible duties of the present and former tariff laws upon manufactures, and a large majority of the Democratic Senators who have hitherto professed the doctrine of a tariff for revenue only, have united and intend to pass this bill, the chief characteristics of which are: First, to admit free of duty from Canada into the United States all the products of the farm and of the farmer; and, second, to admit free a small quantity of pulp wood, wood pulp, and print paper.

It is said—and it is said so often that I, at least, feel compelled to accept the statement as expressive of the situation—that these Senators, constituting a majority of the Senate, have determined to submit to the demand, so frequently repeated, that, without regard to fairness or justice, no change whatsoever shall be made in the terms of the measure, and that it must be passed in the precise form prescribed by the President of the United States. I make no comment upon the spectacle thus presented to the American people; I make no comment upon what seems to me to be an abdication of the duties of the Senate and an abandonment of its responsibilities. I earnestly hope—hope from the bottom of my heart—that these statements or rumors will prove to be a libel upon the Senate and upon the Chief Executive as well. Time alone will tell.

It is also stated in the extracts read and in many others that I might have collected and laid before the Senate that after the so-called or alleged reciprocity measure has been safely passed, Democratic Senators will bring forward certain bills to remove and reduce duties. Their former allies will now, of course, desert them, for however willing they may be to send the farmer into free competition, they will be found valiant enough in the defense of high duties for the rich and powerful manufacturers.

Then, it is said that these Democratic Senators expect that another group of Republican Senators, who for two years now and more have stood consistently and faithfully and earnestly for a reduction of the onerous and excessive duties in the present law and in the law which preceded it, will join them to adopt in some form or other a revision of certain schedules, believing and, as many of the newspapers of the country are insisting, hoping that the President will veto these bills, and that thus the issue for the campaign of 1912 will be prepared.

I am not commissioned to defend the Democratic Senators against this aspersion upon their fidelity to the public interest, but I shall not believe, until I am compelled to believe through the result of a roll call, that the program that is thus insisted upon elsewhere and throughout the country is to be the program of a majority of the Senators of this body. I shall cherish my confidence in the integrity of purpose of all the Senators in this body until it shall be destroyed, not by rumors, not by the speculations of newspaper writers, but by the record itself; and I earnestly hope that this session may draw to a close with that confidence full, complete, and unshaken.

I have, therefore, brought forward this morning a series of amendments to the pending measure for which I ask your calm and patriotic consideration. I am not presenting these amendments in order to defeat the measure as it came from the House of Representatives and as it is insisted upon by the President of the United States; I do not speak for any of my associates who are commonly called progressives; I make no pledge or promise for them; but as for myself, I say that if these amendments or the substance of them receive the approval of the Senate I shall vote for the reciprocal measure about which so much discussion has been had. I do not present these amendments to destroy the measure; I present them to correct the measure, to remove from it the obvious and evident injustice that there is in it. I present them in the hope that by and through their adoption by the Senate of the United States the people of this country can be made to believe that it is the purpose of Congress to deal fairly with all the people of the country and not to select one class for a discrimination so invidious and so harmful that their confidence in our Government must be shattered if the bill as it is receives the approval of Congress and the approval of the President.

I asked in the beginning, as you observed, that the reading of the amendments might be dispensed with, because I wanted to lay them before you from my own standpoint and in my own way. I intend to take them up somewhat in detail a little later, but just now I want to say of them and for them that they do not touch the general tariff of the country. They relate only to our tariff with Canada, and they are fairly and properly a part of any new relation that we desire to establish with that country.

Further than that they do not ask, save in two respects, any additional concession from Canada. As I said the other day, I believe that, in view of her policy, her future, the promise of her development and growth, Canada has in the arrangement which is now before us conceded everything to the United States that she can concede and maintain her industries and perpetuate her prosperity. I do not ask more from Canada. I ask simply that in graduating our concessions to her we shall be mindful of the market in which the farmer must buy as well as the market in which the farmer must sell.

Later I will make more detailed observations upon the amendments, but just now I want Senators to remember, as I proceed, that the only additional concessions which my amendments propose on the part of Canada are all kinds of logs and timber and all kinds of coal. If Canada will admit into her territory all our timber and lumber of whatever kind and all our coal of whatever kind, I for one am content with the concessions which she seems to be willing to grant to us. But these amendments, when they come to deal with the considerations which we grant to Canada, change the whole aspect of the bargain or trade. That you may be able to perceive the purport of the amendments as I proceed with my discussion, allow me to say that I take from the reciprocal dutiable list, so far as the United States is concerned, a list of articles which represent the manufactured products of agriculture as distinguished from the raw products of agriculture. Remember, now all the while, that I am not insisting that Canada shall grant us a like extension of her free list, because she can not do so in justice to herself, but in justice to the American people, in justice to the American consumer, in justice to the American farmer we can not grant the free admission of raw agricultural products from Canada into the United States without at the same time granting to her the free admission of manufactured agricultural products as well. Therefore, after striking from our reciprocal dutiable list these articles, I add them to our free list, namely:

Fresh meats—Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats, excepting game.
Bacon and hams not in tins or jars.
Meats of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, or prepared or preserved in any manner.
Canned meats and canned poultry.
Extract of meat, fluid or not.
Lard and compounds thereof, cottolene and cotton stearin, and animal stearin.
Tallow.
Egg yolk, egg albumen, and blood albumen.
Tomatoes and other vegetables, including corn, in cans or other airtight packages.
Wheat flour and seminola, and rye flour.
Oatmeal and rolled oats.
Corn meal.
Barley malt.
Barley, pot, pearled, or patent.
Buckwheat flour or meal.
Split peas, dried.
Prepared cereal foods of all kinds.
Bran middlings, and other offals of grain used for animal food.
Macaroni and vermicelli.
Biscuits, wafers, and cakes.
Biscuits, wafers, cakes, and other baked articles, composed in whole or in part of eggs or any kind of flour or meal, when combined with chocolate, nuts, fruits, or confectionery; also candied peel, candied popcorn, candied nuts, candied fruits, sugar candy, and confectionery of all kinds.
Maple sugar and maple sirup.
Pickles, including pickled nuts, sauces of all kinds, and fish paste or sauce.
Cherry juice and prune juice, or prune wine, and other fruit juices and fruit sirup, nonalcoholic.

Do you believe, may I ask in passing, that this will render the arrangement less satisfactory to Canada? Do you not know that Canada will look upon the proposal with vastly more favor, if you are desiring the arrangement, with these things added to our free list than she will if they bear reciprocal duties? But that is not all. I add also free lumber of all kinds, and I phrase it in this way:

Logs; timber, however sided or squared; round timber, for whatever use; sawed boards; planks; deals, and other lumber, planed or unplaned, finished or unfinished; laths and shingles.

And so on through the list of lumber, whether raw, partly manufactured, or wholly manufactured. All that I ask is, when you take away from the American farmer the benefits that he has heretofore enjoyed under the protective tariff and the larger benefits and advantages that he is about to enjoy, that you give him at least the opportunity of buying his lumber, whether planed or unplaned, from Canada without imposing upon it any duty whatsoever.

I add also all forms of iron and steel, beginning with iron ore. I am perfectly aware that Canada at this time can not be expected to be a serious competitor with the United States in the production of iron and steel, but we are doing something to build up Canada; we are doing something here to invigorate her industries and carry her forward at a still more rapid pace into the development which she fondly expects and may reasonably hope for. I want, when that time comes, if these industries can be planted, and I believe they will be planted, in Canada, and thus become competitors of our industries of like character, I want the benefit for the American consumer, and especially the American farmer, in the reduced prices which will result from competition of that kind. Do you think Canada will object to the introduction of these articles upon her free list? On the contrary, she will look upon the arrangement with just so much more satisfaction.

I have also included woolen goods and fabrics of all kinds, cotton goods and fabrics of all kinds, silk goods and fabrics of all kinds, leather goods in all their forms, so that in the time to come, if not now, we may reasonably hope for competition in Canada respecting these things that will be as active and as beneficial as it is now said that competition in agricultural products will be.

I can not understand that state of mind which can contemplate the subjection of the farmer to free competition on the hypothesis that the conditions in Canada are substantially the conditions here, that will shrink from free competition in manufactured products as well.

I appeal especially to my friends upon the other side of the Chamber, for I have no hope of my associates on this side of the Chamber; they will help you to remove the duties from agricultural products, but they will not help you to lower the duties by a farthing upon the great manufactured products of the country.

I will be met at once—and I did not intend to enter upon the discussion of the details of these amendments so fully at the present time, but I must be permitted to refer to this phase now—I will be met at once with the thought, if it is not expressed, that we ought not to give these things to Canada for nothing; that we ought to exact something, some concession, from Canada because we extend our free list to that country. That thought has no weight with me. Canada can not give us these things and preserve her own industrial system. But I want to remind Senators that the agitation which began 10 years ago in the ranks of the Republican Party and has continued unabated from that time until the present moment concerned the reduction of our duties for the benefit of our own people—the reduction of our own duties in order that those who consume the things we produce may buy them in the markets of the country at a fair and reasonable price, and the more we give away of unnecessary duties the richer we will be. We ought not to ask any direct equivalent for these concessions to Canada.

I have asked the Senate to adopt the amendments because the very basis of the whole measure that we have before us, as declared over and over again by the President of the United States and by all those who have advocated it, is that the conditions of life and of industry and of manufacture in Canada are substantially similar to our own.

If that is true, we do not need to reduce our duties in dealing with Canada. We need to remove our duties entirely when dealing with Canada, because it was to equalize such conditions as I have named that the advocates and defenders of the protective system—and I am as profoundly impressed and convinced as I ever was before of its justice and its beneficence—established the protective system, and when there are no conditions to equalize, when industry flows upon an even and a level surface we do not require these duties in order to protect our manufacturers.

I should like to hear some one in the Senate before this debate shall have closed give some reason why we should not extend free meat to Canada and free flour and free iron and steel and free boots and shoes—free everything that we think will benefit our own people—and we are proceeding upon the hypothesis, those of us who want to lower duties, that we are rendering a service to our own citizens when we reduce duties, and it would be the height of inconsistency to require that before we yield these duties we must receive from a foreign nation some equivalent for the concessions.

Ah, if you will but look at these amendments from the standpoint which I occupy, if you will but examine them in the spirit which animates me, you will see in the amendments not an obstacle to the establishment of these new relations with Canada, but a new force that will lead the movement to still completer victories. I can not understand why any Senator here who is in favor of the reduction of duties should hesitate for a single moment in approving the amendments I have offered.

Now, the difficulty as I have understood it, and I am speaking mainly to my Democratic friends, because it is upon them that we mainly rely in adopting any amendment to this measure, is one of Executive approval, but it can not be said, and nobody has ever said with any authority, that the President of the United States will veto this bill because we add to the free list with Canada.

All these statements, which are so rife and which seem to have taken possession of so many minds, have been made with regard to amendments which are either entirely dissociated from the arrangement and constitute a general revision of the tariff, or amendments which will make it less probable that the Canadian Government will accept the bill as it passes the Senate or as it passes Congress.

You can not say that with regard to these amendments. You are at one stroke making the measure just, and you are making it more satisfactory to the Canadian Government, and therefore, I assume, inasmuch as the President of the United States wants the enterprise to succeed, more satisfactory to those who have promoted this departure from our general tariff plan.

I would not have it understood, Senators, that if I had been arranging such a matter as this I would have taken up the subject in the way in which it has been taken up. I am a protectionist. I believe that there are some differences in agriculture between Canada and the United States which entitle our farmers to some duty on some things if we are to preserve with integrity our party belief. I do not want it to be understood that I would willingly depart from that doctrine, but I have no control over the existing situation.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Iowa pardon me if I make an inquiry?

Mr. CUMMINS. With pleasure.

Mr. BACON. I desire to do so before the Senator gets too far away from something which he said a few moments ago in regard to the question whether or not the President of the United States would veto a measure. We have had a great deal of talk of that kind in the Senate. The question I desire to ask the Senator is whether he thinks it is a proper thing that legislation should be attempted to be influenced in the Senate by a statement that the President will or that the President will not veto a measure? Does not the Senator think that it is not only the province, but the duty of the legislative department of the Government to proceed in the enactment of measures according to the judgment of the several Houses and without reference to the question what the Executive may think or the Executive may do—at least so far as that reference may be used for the purpose of influencing the acts of the legislative branch of the Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. I answer that inquiry with more gratification than I ever replied to any question put to me upon the floor of the Senate. It is abhorrent to me to hear it suggested that any Senator will be influenced by the probable action of the Executive upon a measure under consideration.

I think it is the beginning of the end of the dignity and the power and the respectability of the House and of the Senate to hear it reiterated day after day that we must not amend a measure because it will meet with the disapproval of the Executive in its amended form. I wish that some one of more experience than I have had in this Chamber and whose words would therefore be weightier and more potential than mine can be would stand here and warn the country of the consequences that must ensue from the attempt to influence legislation through the suggestion that it will or will not meet the approval of the President. I have only referred to this phase of the subject because I have heard day after day Senators rise and say that we can not amend this measure because if we do the President will veto it, and thus we will lose whatever benefit or advantage there may be in it.

The Senator from Georgia has heard these declarations, and I am sure that they have been just as repugnant to him as they have been to me. I wish that the Senate of the United States could once more reassert its immunity from influences of the character that have been suggested.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say, in order that I may not be misunderstood, that of course I recognize the fact that within certain limitations it is contemplated by the Constitution that the President shall communicate to Congress what his views are. Therefore I do not wish to go to the extreme of saying that no consideration is to be paid to the views of the Executive, because I recognize that there is a contemplation in the Constitution in the provision which requires the President to give information to the legislative branch of the Government—a contemplation that there shall be some regard paid to the views thus expressed.

But the particular point that I had in mind and which the Senator from Iowa has more fully expressed is as to the propriety of attempting to influence the action of either branch of Congress by the threat on the floor that if such and such a thing is done, not that it will not meet with the approval—that might be subject to a different construction—but that it will meet with the veto of the President. That, I think, is an improper thing to state on the floor of the Senate, and I took advantage of the opportunity to express my view on it. It is not original with me by any means. I can recollect some very eminent Senators with whom I had the honor to serve when I first came to the Senate expressing themselves in very strong language condemnatory of such a suggestion. It is the high prerogative and function of the legislative branch of the Government to legislate without the suggestion of such arguments for the purpose of influencing their action.

Mr. CUMMINS. I so heartily agree with the Senator from Georgia that I would like to emphasize his view of it in every way I can. I think I recognize the field of propriety in that respect as well as the field of impropriety. The bill is before the Senate, and a Senator considering whether he should vote for it or seek to modify it has quite the right to look at the general views of the Executive and to form a judgment with respect to the fate that it may meet when it reaches him for approval. That is quite right and quite proper. But we have been assaulted here day after day by the newspapers—possibly some of them have not been guilty of it—iterating and reiterating, apparently with authority, that if this bill is amended in any fashion whatsoever, no matter how meritorious the amendment may be, it will be vetoed by the President, and that influence has been poured into this Chamber until it seems to fill the minds of many Senators, and they do not feel at liberty to exercise that judgment and that conscience which they otherwise would.

I am not saying that the President of the United States is responsible for these statements. I know that they are so uniform and so universal that they have at last found lodgment in the Senate, and I repeat I have only referred to this phase of it because I have heard day after day distinguished Senators, especially on the other side of the Chamber, and some on this side of the Chamber, say that although we may make other bills the subject of consideration after this bill has passed, we must not add anything to it, because when it reaches the President it will be disapproved by him.

I repeat that the amendments which I have proposed are in harmony with the arrangement, will speed its progress to a final conclusion, and can not impair the chances of its finally receiving the Executive approval.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say that at present the inclination of my mind is to the method of voting for the reciprocity measure without amendment, but it is not for the reason suggested by the Senator. I would not be influenced in any measure by the suggestions which have been made and which have been repeated by the Senator—that if amended it would meet with an Executive veto. I could not myself be influenced by a consideration of that kind.

But I want to suggest to the learned Senator that it is a poor rule which does not work both ways. I very much favor in the main—I will not say in detail—the reductions which are suggested by him. The only difference between the Senator and myself is as to the method to be pursued in order to effect those reductions. The present inclination of my mind is to pursue them in separate bills.

I understand the Senator to have himself said on the floor of the Senate—I am not sure that I quote him correctly; if I do not he will correct me—but my recollection is that the Senator has himself urged as a reason why the reduction measures should not be adopted separately from the reciprocity measure is that those measures when thus separately enacted would receive an Executive veto. I myself am proposing to proceed to the passage of the reciprocity measure by itself, without reference to the question whether or not the President would veto it; and then I think the consistent course is to pursue the enactment of the reduction measures separately without having the fear of an Executive veto to deter us from so doing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I believe I have repeated heretofore the suggestion, and the Senator from Georgia will remember that I did it in response to a statement from some Senator—I will not name him, nor am I sure that I could name him—that if these bills were presented independently, and if presented in that way they would not be approved by the President, then it was manifest we ought, in order to do justice, to attach them to the reciprocity bill.

But the Senator from Georgia and all Senators who are listening to me must remember that I am now presenting amendments which relate only to Canada. They are not made and could not be made the subject of general bills. Of course, there could be reductions to all countries in our general tariff in an independent bill, but these amendments relate simply to further reductions in duties to the Dominion of Canada. No Senator can deceive himself, I am sure, with the thought that if he does not attach them to the present measure he can make them the subject of an independent measure, because he can not.

There are a great many things in these amendments, I fancy, no Senator would be willing to put on the free list so far as the world at large is concerned, and they are put upon the free list so far as Canada is concerned simply because we are dealing with that nation as though it were substantially like our own, with conditions not very different from our own.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming, who rose first.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask the Senator if, in his judgment, any of his amendments are obnoxious to the parliamentary rule and the rule of the Senate that all amendments must be germane to the subject matter of the bill. I think there may be a possible clearing in the minds of some who desire to vote for some of these amendments, but fear that they may be obnoxious to that parliamentary rule. For myself I do not ask for information, but only to get the views of the Senator in the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to give the Senator from Wyoming my view on that subject. In the first place, there is no parliamentary rule and no rule of the Senate which requires an amendment to be germane to the subject of the bill to which it is offered as an amendment. Our rules provide that with reference to appropriation bills the amendments must be germane, and there are other provisions also with regard to amendments to appropriation bills, but there is no rule of the Senate and no general parliamentary rule which requires an amendment to be germane to a bill. If, however, we were under such a rule, every amendment which I have offered is germane to the subject matter of the bill. In my opinion, when the farmers' products are put on the free list, any amendment which relates to the market in which he must buy is germane to such a bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Iowa is, I think, absolutely correct in suggesting that there is no rule requiring that amendments shall be germane to ordinary legislative bills. I think the records of the Senate will show that on one occasion a land law of great consequence and of great length was offered as an amendment to a private pension bill and it became a part of that bill. Our custom, I think, has been never to raise a question except on appropriation bills as to whether or not an amendment is germane. I may be wrong about the rule, and I would be glad if the Senator from Wyoming would quote the rule, if there is such a rule, because I have forgotten it if it exists.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I did not assume, as a matter of absolute fact, that there was such a rule. I could not assume that because it has frequently occurred that amendments were made which were not in harmony with the general purpose of the bill; but I know that objections of that sort have been raised in regard to the very amendments which are proposed by the Senator from Iowa, and I wanted the views of that Senator in the RECORD so as to show that that view is absolutely not tenable, not for the purpose of raising any discussion as to the parliamentary rule.

Mr. CUMMINS. There seems to be a general concurrence in regard to that.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who rose a few moments ago, if some one will call his attention to the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa yields to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa to discuss the effect of his amendment under the favored-nation clause. I should like to hear a discussion of that phase of his amendment, as I understand he proposes to admit these articles free of duty from Canada. I have offered a similar amendment, limited in its scope. It has since occurred to me that under the favored-nation clause the same advantages will have to be extended to every country in the world. I think if we do that we are skating on thin ice. I should like to hear the Senator's views on that particular phase of his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before I have concluded what I have to say upon my amendments I intend to discuss, with some care, the history and the interpretation of the favored-nation clause. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me to defer an answer to his question until I reach it in the orderly course of my argument.

Mr. GORE. I, of course, would prefer that the Senator should do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will only say now, in order not to leave any false or misleading impression in the mind of any Senator, that in my opinion the bill as I propose to amend it is much less likely to collide with the favored-nation clause than the bill as it is presented to the Senate by the House of Representatives and by the President.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Canada being largely an agricultural country, the bill as now proposed would, in agricultural products, conclude a reciprocity agreement with the United States. If that agreement should work a hardship to the farmer because of the fact that Canada is so largely agricultural and is limited in her manufactured articles, the remedy proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa would meet the contention that injury is done the farmer, that his wheat is put in competition with Canadian wheat and his rye and barley and his animal products. But when it comes to manufactured products, if a like reciprocal arrangement were made with Canada, would the farmer receive the same remedy to compensate for the evil done? Would there not of necessity be a call for a larger free-trade arrangement with other countries to offset what he might suffer? I see that the so-called farmers' free-list bill has no relation whatever to Canada.

Just one question further. I am asking for information, and I hope the Senator from Iowa will devote a few moments to this point. Was it not, perhaps, for that reason that the President of the United States did not propose that Canada should give all these articles in the limited measure in which she manufactures free to the United States? Was it not for the very reason that when he opened that question he would lay himself liable largely to other countries which do manufacture extensively, but which do not produce extensively?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, one part of the question I exclude at once, for I would not venture upon an answer to it, namely, I do not know what actuated the President. I do not know what his views are upon the subject suggested. I can only answer for my own. It is quite true, as suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, that the amendments which I have proposed enlarging our free list, so far as Canada is concerned, will not constitute full and adequate compensation to the farmer for putting him in free competition with the Canadian farmer; and I do not want it to be understood for a moment that I think these amendments are the only ones that should be added or made to this bill.

I agree that in order to restore the equilibrium we must reduce duties with other countries, and I agree that we must put a great many things upon the free list with the world in order to give the farmer a fair market in which to buy. We are far, however, from accomplishing that purpose, and this step in the right direction in no wise interferes with the next one that ought to be taken.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me just one other suggestion——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In all fairness to this side, the Senator has come exactly to the position I have and that this side have maintained in regard to reciprocity, namely, that this step toward the admission of Canadian products in return for American products is a step in the right direction, and that it does not go far enough. Yet we are perfectly willing to take it as far as it goes, and I am glad to see that the Senator from Iowa, in reference to manufactured products, has taken exactly the same position.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, now, I can not wholly concur with the Senator from South Carolina. I do not believe that this is a step in the right direction. I believe that unless it is accompanied with whatever relief practically free trade with Canada can give the farmer it is a step in the wrong direction. I agree that if we can put the American farmer upon the same plane or basis with the Canadian farmers with respect to what he buys, as well as with regard to what he sells, we have taken a step in the right direction; but whenever you stop short and this year put the farmer in free competition with his chief rival and then delay to some far-distant, vague time the compensation that you would give him, when you at least could give him all the benefits that free trade with Canada in manufactured products will give him, you are doing him, as I think, a grave injustice, and you are not stepping in the right direction. I expect to join whoever shall be in favor of reducing duties generally. I expect to be in favor of putting upon the free list very many things that are not now there. I have voted so before; I shall vote so again.

But why will not the Senator from South Carolina join me in putting on the free list, so far as the United States is concerned, meat as well as cattle, and flour as well as wheat?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I would answer, Mr. President, by saying that I am heartily in accord with the idea of incorporating into our law the proposition known as the free-list bill and allowing it to take such scope as will compensate the farmer in the largest possible sense for the injury done him. I think that answers that question.

I want to ask the Senator from Iowa another question, and I do it because of his frankness and his disposition to go to the bottom of every phase of this question. I am not saying this in any facetious mood; I am in earnest. I take great pleasure in listening to his arguments. But there was one point he made a moment ago, and it was made by a Senator yesterday, that now that the production of grain has about reached the point where consumption and production are about equal, when for the first time in the history of the American farmer he is coming to the point where the protective doctrine can be of benefit to him, it seems to me the irresistible logic of that position is that here is an industry of the United States exploited to its fullest extent in view of the area necessary for other American agricultural products; that now the American people, having to eat bread, must be forced by legislative enactment to depend upon the American farmer; and as the population exceeds production and the necessity for living becomes sharper, the American farmer comes into his own in that the circumstances of the case put him in a position where he can mulct every American bread eater and make him pay him a premium because of this law. I want to say, Mr. President, in this connection, that as a farmer I do not subscribe to that, and in so far as I produce grain, I am perfectly willing to take my chances with the Creator who opened up the fields for the benefit of those people for the necessities of life. I do not think it is good statesmanship or good politics to say that, because a geographical line divides us from Canada and the American wheat fields have reached their limit of supplying the American people, therefore the American wheat consumer, by virtue of a system which the Republican Party has inaugurated, must be made to pay a premium to the American farmer.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I differentiate very sharply between what will probably happen and what ought to happen, but I think it is probably true that there is something that clusters around the foodstuffs of a country which precludes raising their price materially by means of a tariff. But I differ entirely with the Senator from South Carolina when he says we have reached the limit of production of foodstuffs.

Mr. President, if the profit in agriculture were sufficient, the United States has a soil which, because of its fertility as well as its extent, could raise foodstuffs not only for our 90,000,000, but for our 90,000,000 multiplied five times and more. It is only a question of profit in the business.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Wait just a moment. Now, mark, if we are to preserve—and I am now speaking to my fellow Senators on this side—if we are to preserve the wages which are supposed to be lifted up through the medium of the protective tariff, if we are to preserve the profits in manufactures that are supposed to be made possible by the protective tariff, then the farmers' products are just as much entitled to be lifted up and held up through the protective tariff as are the wages of our workmen and the profits of our manufacturers.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator's argument from the standpoint of equity, if we are to have a protective system, is all right, but I want to ask the Senator this question: If through the operation of protection for the grain growers or the agricultural producers, they are given such profit as is suggested by inference from the Senator's remarks as to encourage the back-to-the-farm movement, which has been a cry of late years, and this increase of the fields reaches the 9 times 90, you will then have such an export surplus that you will immediately reduce the farmer to conditions that have just antedated those that you are now congratulating him upon having arrived at. Therefore, under this argument, the inference seems irresistible that you must grant the farmer just such profit as will enable him merely to furnish the American people with just enough bread at just a profit, and then preclude him from making any more, because so surely as he makes a surplus through the profitableness of his occupation and that surplus is thrown upon the markets of the world in competition with other countries that have not our system of protection, the price in America will inevitably sink to the price of that surplus.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter upon any discussion of the protective system. I——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Allow me just a moment. I know that my friend from South Carolina finds no defense for it; I am a believer in it, but just at this time I see the farmer passing out of it. There is nothing that can be done in this Chamber or elsewhere to keep him in it.

Now, if it were imminent, if it were a question that were about to be debated or decided by impartial minds, I would be glad to enter upon a general review of that subject; but I know that the day has come in which the farmer is to be excluded from the benefits and advantages of the protective tariff. The decree has already been written. It only needs the formal approval—I will not say forever, but for the time being—to exclude him from the company of the manufacturers of the United States.

I shall not exhaust my strength in endeavoring to resist the movement which has received such an impetus here, not only upon your side of the Chamber but upon ours as well. The only thing that I am trying to do is to make sure that as the farmer passes out from the consideration of the American Congress, at the moment that he is denied the privileges which he has heretofore enjoyed, at the moment that he is subjected in his products to free competition with the world practically, he shall at least receive whatever advantage there is in buying freely from Canada all her manufactured products. That is my whole case, and there is no answer to it; there will be no answer attempted to it. I will venture to say that no man will rise in this Chamber and deny either its justice or its fairness. I shall make that record for and in behalf of the American farmer, and I will leave him in the future to determine who stood in the way of the slight benefit or compensation that might ensue to him if he had free trade with Canada in manufactured products as well.

I now yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, we hear so little from those who are supporting this pact that when Senators, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has done, come into the discussion, I feel as though we are justified in trying to find out, if it can be done, what their attitude is with reference to this particular bill. Now, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, the Senator from South Carolina seemed to base his support of this bill upon the ground that food products under present conditions are being taxed and that this bill is removing that tax. I should like to know where the features are in this bill that remove any present tax upon a food product to the consumer. For instance, here is wheat put on the free list; will you get any cheaper bread? Here is barley put on the free list; will you get any cheaper beer? Here is rye put on the free list; will you get any cheaper whisky? Here is oats put on the free list; will you get any cheaper oatmeal or any cheaper breakfast food? No. Here is cattle put on the free list; will you get any cheaper meat? No. The tariff remains higher than before bread and upon flour, and, as the Senator from Texas showed clearly the other day, the tariff remains higher than before upon meat.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, will the Senator from South Dakota allow me?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am holding the floor simply until the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] gets a drink of water. I think he is about to return, but I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina if he will simply indicate where the other side finds any relief to the consumer.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS entered the Chamber.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield the floor to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. This is a very important and interesting discussion, and I think we ought to have more Senators in attendance. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Kenyon	Pomerene
Borah	Curtis	Lippitt	Shively
Bourne	Dillingham	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Dixon	McLean	Smoot
Briggs	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Stone
Brown	Gallinger	Myers	Swanson
Bryan	Gore	Nelson	Thornton
Burnham	Gronna	Oliver	Townsend
Burton	Heyburn	Overman	Watson
Chilton	Hitchcock	Page	Williams
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Works
Crawford	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins

Mr. THORNTON. My colleague, the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], has been called from the Chamber.

Mr. STONE. I announce that my colleague [Mr. REED] is unavoidably out of the city for a day or two. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I was in hopes that some member of the Finance Committee would be here. It is evident that there is no interest in this subject of reciprocity—not enough to keep a quorum here. Would it not be well to postpone this matter until next November or December? I would call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who I believe is the next ranking member of the Committee on Finance——

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not hear the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. NELSON. It is evident—and I make that suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]—that it is difficult to keep a quorum in the Chamber to consider this matter, and in view of that fact would it not be a good plan to postpone the further consideration of this subject until next November or December?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a hesitancy in even expressing an opinion in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who is my mentor to a certain extent in matters of legislation which come before that committee. I will say for myself that if I could have my way I would have a concurrent resolution passed through both Houses of Congress taking a recess until the first Monday in December next. That is what I would do, but I apprehend that is impossible, and I suppose we have got to have this tedious—and I have no reference——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt what I am saying is tedious.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no reference to the Senator from Iowa because he always talks entertainingly, but tedious for the reason that we find it difficult to get Senators to talk, and we amble along here discussing all sorts of things, and I do not see that we are making very much progress. If we are not to take a recess, which I would like to have taken, I personally am in favor of voting on these bills in the near future. I do not want to be kept here all summer engaged in mere conversation. I should like action of some kind or other.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the difficulty in the case is this: There is scarcely anyone who is willing to say much of anything good on this reciprocity bill, and that is very embarrassing. They not only seem not disposed to say much in favor of it, but they are not disposed to listen to those who are saying something against it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I think this is the first instance in my somewhat protracted experience in this body when a bill, important as this is claimed to be, has come before the Senate without the proponents of the bill advocating it and leading the way, blazing the way, for the opponents of the bill to take their position in regard to it.

It is extraordinary, but I do not see how we can change that. It has pained me; I have tried to remain in my seat and have done so when I possibly could; but it has pained me to see so many empty seats when distinguished Senators, like the Senator from Minnesota, were making illuminating arguments against this bill. It was painful.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. It does not pain me at all to speak to empty seats. I know perfectly well that every Senator has made up his mind with respect to this matter. We are not considering it in the light of reason. That doctrine which has recently received such impetus and emphasis in another branch of this Government does not prevail here. There is no Senator who cares anything about the reason of it—and I am not disparaging Senators either—and therefore I do not want it to be understood that I complain in the least degree of the habit of Senators in leaving the Chamber. I know that it is impossible for the chairman of the Finance Committee to remain here. He is never here except at roll calls—I mean while this measure is under discussion—and for a very good reason. In his heart he is not for this bill. He feels compelled to vote for it for reasons which he has not yet given to the Senate and probably will not.

But I resume, leaving the Senators at entire liberty, so far as I am concerned, to go wheresoever their inclinations lead them.

Mr. STONE and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina for a question, but I do not want his argument, which I concede is better phrased, but I can not agree is better bottomed than mine, interjected into the RECORD at just this place.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is not. But the Senator yielded to the Senator from South Dakota to ask me a question, and it is just for a moment to reply to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But if the Senator from South Carolina will not take it ill, I hope he will reserve his reply to the Senator from South Dakota until some other time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The only reason——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will willingly yield to a question to me, but not for an argument on the subject.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is not for an argument. It almost amounts to a question of personal privilege. But if the Senator sees fit to allow him to incorporate what he says——

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina. He can speak as long as he pleases.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa yields the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am much obliged to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have, I think with sufficient detail, explained to the Senate the character of the amendments which I have proposed to the bill. There are some Senators here, however, who have not heard the explanation, and I know they will do me the honor to read these amendments.

I now desire to say a few words with respect to the general subject, in order to make it perfectly clear what attitude I assume with regard to reciprocity with Canada.

Mr. President, the import duties which for many years we have levied and which we are now levying against Canada are indefensible from any point of view, moral or economic; and it is not strange that millions of our people, without either critical or comprehensive knowledge of the proposal contained in the bill now under consideration, give it their approval, simply because it removes some of the unnecessary burdens laid upon commerce between Canada and the United States.

I was one of the pioneers in the movement for freer trade relations between the two countries, and I am still so thoroughly convinced that reciprocal relations can be established which will be of lasting and mutual advantage that I profoundly regret my inability to give this measure, in its present form, my instant and cordial support. I would gladly vote for absolute free trade between the two nations, but I know that Canada could not endure, and therefore will not accept, free competition. I would cheerfully vote for a horizontal reduction of 50 per cent in our duties against the Dominion without asking any reduction whatever in Canadian duties against us, not only because it would be just, but because it would benefit the United States.

Our average duties upon dutiable articles brought in from Canada, put upon an ad valorem basis, have been for many years and now are about 43 per cent. Canada's average duties levied upon our imports into that country, reduced to the same basis, have been and are a little less than 25 per cent. Under this striking disparity of tariffs the 7,000,000 of people in Canada bought from us last year commodities of the value of $239,000,000, whereas the 90,000,000 of people in the United States bought from Canada commodities of the value of $113,000,000. It is not possible to emphasize the significance of these plain facts, and I repeat here, as I have so often said elsewhere, that it is our immediate and imperative duty to correct so flagrant a wrong committed, not alone against our own people, but the people of a neighboring and friendly nation as well.

In view of the opinions I have so long held and so frequently expressed, it is hard to believe that I will be driven to the alternatives of expressing my sympathy with the movement for freer trade with Canada by voting for the bill or of expressing my deep conviction of its inadequacy and its unfairness by voting against it. Of one thing, however, I am sure, namely, that it is my bounden duty as a citizen and as a Member of this body to expend all the strength I have in the effort to so amend the proposal that it will not only create better relations between the two countries, but will be just to the people of our own country.

In view of the insistence from many quarters, high and low, that the proposed arrangement as found in the bill ought to be immune from the ordinary processes of legislation and that it is our duty to either accept or reject it without amendment, I intend to inquire somewhat into the source of the alleged immunity, for the purpose of ascertaining, if it be possible, why we should abdicate the powers and duties which the Constitution confers and imposes upon us. Whatever opinions we may hold upon the arrangement submitted to us by the President, every Senator who is conscious of the least respect for the body of which he is a Member must regret the circumstances which have surrounded the measure on its way to the Senate and which seem to have fixed its standing here.

The Constitution bestows authority to legislate upon Congress and the authority to veto upon the President, but with reference to this bill the powers of these departments of government seem to be transposed; for if we yield to the demand so intolerantly made, it is the President who has exercised the powers of legislation and Congress the powers of approval or rejection. Upon a former occasion I entered my protest against the modern tendency toward the Executive usurpation of legislative functions, and I enter it again. It may be granted that sometimes through the single will of an Executive more and better things may be accomplished for the people than through the diversified wills of a discordant body of legislators; but if the experience of the world has proved any one thing in government, it is that the safety and permanence of free institutions depend upon the rigid observance of the lines which mark the separate provinces of legislative, executive, and judicial authority.

I heartily commend the President for his careful investigation of this subject, and receive with respect his recommendations, but I dissent wholly from the opinion apparently held by some of his advisers that the executive department could, without legislative authority, lawfully make a proposal to Canada or lawfully receive a proposal from Canada touching changes in the tariff law.

There are many people who believe, honestly no doubt, that we ought to approve or disapprove the arrangement just as it was agreed upon by the State Department, and that any attempt to amend it is but an indirect effort to accomplish its defeat. This belief implies that the measure is not before us as an ordinary revenue bill, originating in the House of Representatives, and under the Constitution as open to amendment here as a bill of any other character, but that it has some peculiar characteristic which exempts it from the usual course of legislation. I do not know nor do I care what power the representatives of Canada had in the matter, but I propose to examine, in the friendliest spirit, the authority of the executive department of our Government to do what it has done. In the abstract, I can but regard the course pursued as a dangerous intrusion upon the rights and privileges of the Congress of the United States. I would not dwell a single moment upon this phase of the subject were it not that, as a consequence of it, we are met in the Senate by two propositions, both of which are asserted in order to destroy the liberty of amendment which ordinarily we exercise according to our individual consciences and judgments, but of which we are, in this instance, sought to be deprived. These propositions are:

First. That the executive department has carried its negotiations and its agreements to that point which enables it to say that Canada will not give more for the concessions which we grant, nor take less for the concessions which she grants, nor consider other proposals.

Second. That, as viewed by other nations, what has been done so far constitutes a completed arrangement, that if Congress, in order to equalize both the burdens and the benefits of the arrangement among our own people, adds to our concessions without insisting upon additional concessions from Canada, then we must make the additional concessions to all countries with which we have treaties embracing the favored-nation clause.

I dispute both of these propositions, and insist that Congress is the only power which can make a proposal to Canada respecting tariff changes; that Congress ought to make just such a proposal as justice and the interest of our own people require, and that when such proposal is made by Congress and accepted by Canada, other nations can not inquire into the unauthorized negotiations carried on and the immaterial conclusions reached by our State Department, nor into the adequacy of the consideration which we accept for our concessions.

I must be clearly understood. Of course, no one claims that the House had not a strict legal right to pass whatever bill it pleased relating to our tariff with Canada, and no one claims that the Senate has not the technical power to amend the bill passed by the House to any extent that it sees fit, but the effort is to make these constitutional rights and powers barren and worthless by terrorizing both Congress and the country with the picture of the dismal consequences that will ensue if we do not ratify and vitalize the precise meeting of minds between Mr. Knox, our Secretary of State, and Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson, who represented the ministry of the Dominion of Canada.

My view of it is that the delusion created by the diplomatic exchanges ought to disappear; that the Senate ought to look upon the President's message as indicating his opinion respecting the legislation which should be had, entitled to great weight because of its high authority; that we ought to accept the letter of Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson as expressive of the opinion of two eminent gentlemen interested in Canada's welfare; that we ought to inform ourselves from every source of knowledge, and having thus equipped ourselves for the performance of the duty before us we should make to Canada just such legislative proposal relating to changes in tariff duties as will be fair to our neighbor and beneficial to ourselves.

In order to fortify the opinions which I have ventured to lay before the Senate a brief retrospect will not, I am sure, be regarded as inappropriate. The President has the sole power to make treaties with foreign nations. Congress has the sole power to lay taxes, including the levying of duties on imports, and the sole power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Deferring for a moment the consideration of the question whether the treaty-making power can ever include the fixing of duties on imports without the authority of Congress, I submit:

First, that the arrangement before us, concluded upon the one side by the State Department of the United States and Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson upon the part of Canada, is not a treaty, and if the bill before us is passed and with the approval of the President becomes a law, it will not constitute a treaty between the two countries. It is to be observed that the President in his message, transmitted to Congress in the early part of the year, carefully refrains from describing it as a treaty. Referring to the two representatives of the Department of State who had been despatched by the department to Canada to confer upon the subject, he says:

They were authorized to take steps to formulate a reciprocal trade agreement.

And again, referring to the conclusion of their labors, he says:

The result of the negotiations was that on the 21st instant a reciprocal trade agreement was reached, the text of which I herewith transmit with accompanying correspondence and other data.

The two Canadian ministers, in their letter with attached schedules which, together with the acceptance on the part of the Secretary of State, constitutes whatever agreement was made, says:

2. We desire to set forth what we understand to be the contemplated arrangement, and to ask you to confirm it.

3. It is agreed that the desired tariff arrangement shall not take the formal shape of a treaty, but that the Governments of the two countries will use their utmost efforts to bring about such concurrent legislation at Washington and Ottawa.

It must be a little humiliating to the pride of Members of Congress to note that the Canadian ministers, in the passage I have quoted, as well as in the subsequent paragraph, refer to the Government of the United States as synonymous with the Executive Department of the United States, but in view of the occurrences of recent years it is not strange that foreigners should forget that Congress is a part of the Government of this country.

Recurring, however, to the subject in hand, it is quite clear that the persons who made the arrangement consciously refrained from denominating it as a treaty, and it must be assumed that they did it advisedly. A treaty is an international contract, and its very essence is the imposition of contractual obligations. A treaty without an obligation is as impossible as life without air. If the bill becomes a law there will be no promise, no obligation, on either side. Furthermore, if it be a treaty, which under the Constitution the Executive may make, the House of Representatives has no more authority to deal with it, or interfere with it, than it has with the nomination of a public officer, and before it could become effective the Senate must ratify it by a two-thirds vote. I must not, however, prolong the discussion by additional observations upon this phase of the matter, because it is not conceivable that the conclusions suggested will be disputed.

As I understand the scope of Executive activity, the only authority under which the President can enter into any agreement whatsoever with a foreign nation is the authority to make treaties. The Constitution does not repose in him the power to negotiate or make trade arrangements or agreements unless they are at the same time within the treaty-making authority, and I believe it to be true that for 57 years, at least, with possibly one exception, no President has ever attempted to change our tariff in a treaty without the previous authority of Congress.

Again I say that it must not be inferred from this analysis of the situation that I am assailing the motives of the executive department of the Government or seeking for the sake of criticism to question its authority. I am simply bringing to your attention what the President and the Secretary of State ought to be the first to concede, viz, that all that they have done has been solely for the information of Congress. If no Member of the House of Representatives had been willing to introduce a bill embodying the arrangement which has been agreed upon by the Secretary of State and the two Canadian ministers, it would have been legally impossible for the President to have invoked the action of the Senate upon it.

Mr. President, I am about to take up another phase of this matter, and, inasmuch as I have been speaking substantially for two hours and the day is rather oppressive, I will yield the floor, with the statement that I will endeavor to regain it at the close of the routine morning business to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when adjournment occurred last evening I was discussing the Wilson bill with reference to the trade relations between the United States and Canada and the position of the Republican Party upon that bill. I am trying to find out, if I can, what has been the true doctrine of the Republican Party with reference to the particular matter about which we are now concerned.

I am now going to read a document which has been circulated in every Republican campaign since it was issued, including the campaign which brought the present administration into power. It constitutes a solemn pledge between the Republican organization and the agricultural interests of this country. It is a document which has been circulated not only generally but specifically in those States where the great farming vote is found. I have not been able myself to discover that change in the condition of facts and affairs which has changed the principle as we have laid it down from time to time in every campaign from 1864 until and including the campaign of three years ago. This is a portion of the document:

Not content with the injury these proposed changes would work to the Pacific coast, it is proposed that the protective duties on many agricultural products provided for by the McKinley bill and previous legislation shall be removed, the barrier which we have erected against agricultural productions from Canada and other foreign countries broken down, and American farmers placed in free competition with Canadian producers. The provision of the Wilson bill in this regard may be briefly stated, as follows:

"Buckwheat, corn or maize, corn meal, oats, oatmeal, rye, rye flour, wheat, and wheat flour are to pay a duty of 20 per cent; but each of the above articles shall be admitted free of duty from any country which imposes no import duty on the like product when exported from the United States."

That is the provision which incurred the displeasure and the continued denouncement of the Republican organization from the time it was put in the Wilson bill until we took it out by the pledge which we made to the American farmer that we would take it out if we were given the power, and the American farmer gave us the power and we immediately proceeded to change it in the Dingley bill.

Of course, no country importing largely of our agricultural products will impose a duty upon them, and this provision of the Wilson bill means free trade with Canada and with all other countries in the articles mentioned. Barley, under the McKinley bill, is subject to a duty of 30 cents per bushel, which has had the effect of limiting the amount of barley imported from Canada and stimulating its production by our farmers. But by the Wilson bill barley, barley malt, and barley pearled, patent, or hulled is subjected to a duty of only 20 per cent ad valorem. Duties upon live animals are largely decreased by the Wilson bill and fixed at 20 per cent ad valorem. Duties upon dairy products and upon beans, peas, hay, potatoes, and other vegetables which are not placed upon the free list are largely reduced. The duty is reduced upon raisins and other dried grapes to 1½ cents per pound. Apples, green or ripe; apples, dried, desiccated, or evaporated; bacon and hams; beef, mutton, and pork, and meats of all kinds; prepared or preserved birds, and land and water fowls; cabbages; eggs and yolks of eggs; fish and insects; fresh fish; and many other products of agriculture are placed upon the free list.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to know what document the Senator from Idaho is now reading?

Mr. BORAH. I am reading from a speech delivered by Senator Dolph in 1894, and which was afterwards used as a campaign document by the Republican national organization.

Mr. DIXON. It was circulated as a Republican campaign document?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir; and I presume that almost every Republican campaign speaker used it as a reference from time to time. It was a document which was well known to the Republican organization, and, as I said, it has been in constant use. Mr. Dolph said further:

Putting iron ore, coal, lumber, and the principal agricultural products on the free list will be especially disastrous to the belt of agricultural, lumbering, and mining States along the Canadian border. Under the House bill, if it should become a law, we would have free trade in these articles with Canada. Extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific the United States and Canada lie side by side, divided only by an imaginary line, with similar forests and mines, with the same character of soil, but with cheaper lands, cheaper labor, and more undeveloped resources upon the Canadian side. It is proposed to throw down the barrier which had protected agriculture in the United States and compelled the Canadians to contribute largely to our Treasury and to admit the products of the cheaper soil and cheaper labor of Canada into the United States free. It is proposed that we shall make an exceedingly foolish bargain with Canada and give her the markets of 67,000,000 people for the privilege of sending free certain agricultural products into a country having 5,000,000 people.

This was, of course, a speech made in 1894, and there is a larger population at the present time.

But this disproportion between the population of the two countries is not the worst feature of the proposed reciprocity. The raw products of Canada and those of the United States are substantially the same. Reciprocity with Canada would mean a very different thing from the reciprocity with Mexico or South American countries, from which, with reciprocity, we might get in exchange for our products products of those countries which we do not produce; but with the duty removed or reduced upon the products of the forest, the mines, and the soil of Canada, the only result will be to make farming profitable in Canada, to increase the amount of Canadian products annually exported to the United States, to crowd out of our home markets a like amount of our own products. The amount of Canadian imports will not greatly affect prices in the United States, but will affect domestic production and relieve the Canadian producers from the burden of paying duties at our ports. It will result in benefiting the Canadian producer, in loss to our Treasury and to American farmers exposed to Canadian competition.

Our tariff upon agricultural products has made farming unprofitable in Canada, has protected farmers on our northern frontier from undue competition with Canadian products, has added greatly to our revenues, contributed, as everyone admits, by the Canadian producer, has caused such a difference in the prosperity of the two countries as to induce a very large immigration of the most industrious, enterprising citizens of the Dominion to the United States. All these advantages are to be absolutely thrown away without any compensating benefits, and only to carry out an unsound theory concerning free trade in raw materials Our people are to be further taxed; new schemes of taxation are to be devised to make them contribute to the revenues the amount which, under existing laws, is now contributed by Canadians.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. May I ask the Senator from Idaho whether, in his opinion, the condition mentioned in the speech which he is reading now prevails, that the prosperity in the United States is so great that we are enjoying a great immigration from Canada at the present time of Canadians dissatisfied with their condition?

Mr. BORAH. It was stated on the floor yesterday that some 94,000 Canadians had come to this country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. However, it was also stated yesterday that a much larger number of Americans were leaving the United States and going to Canada to enjoy their greater prosperity.

Mr. BORAH. That is due to the fact of cheaper lands in Canada. But the emigration from Canada to this country is due undoubtedly to the fact that the Canadians desired to secure work in our manufacturing centers. Those are the points to which they go. But our farmers are leaving their farms in this country and taking Canadian farms.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think it is just to say that when the immigration is coming from Canada into the United States it indicates a greater prosperity in the United States, but when the tide of emigration is the other way and is going from the United States into Canada it does not indicate that they have a degree of prosperity which is attractive even to the people of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. If the people who come from Canada into the United States come here to engage in the same kind of occupation that the people who leave the United States go to Canada to engage in, the argument of the Senator from Nebraska would be conclusive; but we are engaged here in legislation which disparages the American farmer, which accentuates the movement of the American farmer to Canada, and which, on the other hand, accentuates the movement of the Canadian to the manufacturing centers of the United States. That is precisely the vice of the measure.

That is precisely the injustice, the inequity, and the unfairness of this legislation. It is designed to place an additional embarrassment, an additional hardship, upon the American farmer, and therefore will tend to drive the American farmer to the Canadian side or to the city and manufacturing centers. On the other hand, it will be a benefit, as is supposed, to the American manufacturer and would naturally call for a Canadian to come into the manufacturing centers to find employment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that that is the argument made by the Senator from Idaho and others who agree with him; but I call his attention to the fact that he is reading now to the Senate an argument against reciprocity based upon the fact tha conditions in the United States at the time the speech was delivered which he is reading were so much more prosperous, as proved by the immigration from Canada into the United States, whereas at the present time, as we all know, that particular condition is exactly reversed; and I am asking him whether that argument has any application at all at the present time.

Mr. BORAH. I do not agree with the proposition so universally stated by the Senator from Nebraska, that the reverse of that proposition is now true. It is reversed as to a particular avocation, but not as a general proposition.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if the immigration into Canada at present is not almost exclusively the result of the cheap lands that are being opened up in Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. BORAH. There are several causes, in my judgment, contributing to the emigration to Canada. One of the principal reasons for the emigration is the tenacity with which the American Congress holds on to the antiquated land laws of the United States. Canada has made the acquisition of land in her dominion easy, comparatively speaking. A party may go into Canada and acquire a homestead by three years' residence, and he has permission to leave that homestead six months out of each year. The acquisition of public lands in Canada has been made comparatively easy, especially when a comparison is made with the United States. That has been one of the elements.

In addition to that there is another element. I am not stating it as a matter of criticism or of commendation; I let that take care of itself at some other time; but we have included in our reserves in the West some thirty-five or forty million acres of agricultural lands; and the western immigrant will not contend with the rules and regulations and conditions of acquiring a homestead in such a reserve when he can go across the Canadian border and acquire a homestead more easily and without the embarrassments which surround him here.

Then, thirdly, there is undoubtedly the proposition of cheaper lands. Lands are cheaper in Canada, whether you estimate the value from the standpoint of the manner of acquisition under the law or from the manner of purchase. Those things have contributed to the result.

Since 1900, 500,000 American farmers have left the American side and gone to the Canadian side to acquire farms. Five hundred thousand of the best brawn and blood of the western civilization have passed over to become citizens, at least landholders and farmers, upon the Canadian side. That not only represents the manhood but it represents the wealth which those men carried with them and the possibility of the great wealth which they are to create.

I do not understand, Mr. President, why it should be thought wise statesmanship to accentuate the immigration from the United States into Canada. I do not understand why it should be thought the part of wisdom to add an additional inducement for the American settler to go to Canada instead of remaining in the United States. I do not understand why it should be thought wise, not only in view of his advantage by reason of the cheaper land, but why it should be thought wise to give the additional advantage of having cheaper lands and the better advantages without sustaining the burdens of government which we have to sustain in this country.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. What I wished particularly to emphasize was the fact that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was wrong in this particular, to wit, that the prosperity of this country was not inducing immigration from Canada. Those of us who live near the border know that there is a constant tide from Canada coming into the United States for one reason and another. Were it not for the fact of the cheaper land proposition, which has just been explained by the Senator from Idaho, there would be no doubt that the immigration from Canada would be several times as large as the tide from the United States into the Canadian Provinces.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt that is true. Mr. Dolph continued:

The McKinley bill considerably increased the duties on many agricultural products, protected and stimulated agriculture in the United States, increased taxation upon importations of Canadian products into this country; but under the House bill this policy is to be reversed. This is but another example of the insincerity of the Democratic Party when it professes friendship for the farmer and laboring man.

And now the Republican Party must take its position alongside the Democratic Party in its insincerity to the American farmer.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am in some doubt as to whether my colleague intends to say that the Republican Party will do it or is doing it. Some Republicans may be doing it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am glad my colleague makes that distinction. There is some consolation, some balm, in that suggestion, but very little. I wish there were more.

Mr. President, I desire to read another paragraph or two from the speech of former Senator Dolph before I proceed, as I know the Senate is very anxious to hear it. He said further:

> The blow threatened against manufacturers is to fall and expend itself at last upon the producers of raw materials, upon the agricultural and laboring classes. But let no one be deceived. The blow at the farmer, the lumberman, the miner, and the laborer, while it will fall first upon them, will reach and be felt by every industry, by all classes and all sections. Why is it proposed to put wool on the free list and to destroy an industry which has heretofore afforded a living to 150,000 small farmers in this country and employment for as many additional laborers; an industry which has made farming profitable upon portions of the rugged soil of the Eastern States not adapted to agriculture, and enables the mountain regions of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah to be utilized? Why destroy an industry which with proper protection would eventually make this the most extensive wool-producing country in the world and enable us to furnish the raw materials for our own manufacturers?
> As the result of the legislation proposed by the House bill, the flocks that graze upon the mountain sides of the great West, and the smaller flocks of the smaller farmers of the East, will be driven to the slaughter pen, the woolgrowing industry will be destroyed, thousands of laborers thrown out of employment, thousands of farmers ruined, and all to make a market for the wool of Australia and South American countries, raised upon cheap lands with cheap labor and with climatic advantages we do not possess.

But, Mr. President, there came a time in this country when it was a noticeable fact that the great voting strength of this country was in the cities, and also a noticeable fact that the great strength of the press was in the cities, and both the political parties began to play for that influence. Elections are now controlled by the cities and public opinion molded by the great dailies. The result of it is that the contest upon the tariff question to-day is between the centers of population and the producing or agricultural class. The geographical taint or division which once characterized the fight has practically disappeared, and for the purpose of securing that great strength in political marts it would appear that both parties have concluded that the proper thing to do is to put raw material of all kinds upon the free list and to leave undisturbed those articles which are controlled by corporations, combines, and trusts, which have been collecting toll upon everything that leaves the farm and goes to the consumers. We begin our revision with the man outside the trust. Instead of attacking the powerful monopolies which fix prices, regardless of State lines or national lines; instead of a brave effort to restore competition or to regulate prices, we adopt the temporizing, deceptive plan of putting cheaper raw material into the hoppers of the trust, hoping, apparently, that the unconscionable combines will become satiated to satiety and give the consumer some of the benefits. I feel so earnestly and so bitterly at this shirking of a great responsibility and of the restraining language of debate is utterly unfit for the occasion.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho if, instead of saying "both of the political parties," he should not say "the Democratic Party and the administration"? I am not willing to concede that President Taft, in the crusade in which he is now engaged for free trade in agricultural products, represents the Republican Party of this Nation.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I do not get very much consolation out of that, either. In any event, I prefer not to deal with individuals.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I want to join the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] in his protest, but I put it on a different basis than did the Senator in his observation. I am unwilling to admit that as to the Democratic Party, and to commit them to a policy of opposition to any reduction of duties on manufactured articles. We favor such reduction now, and have always favored it, and we expect before long to be cooperating with the Senator from Idaho in a very substantial reduction of duties.

Mr. BORAH. The amount of consolation which I am getting out of this debate is very exhilarating on this hot afternoon. But how subtly and dextrously the Democratic Party leaves to the last the great trust-controlled articles, and with what scientific malevolence it reaches, like a professional garroter, the jugular vein of the producer.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. In response to the last suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, that the President possibly did represent the Republican Party, I desire to say, with the permission of the Senator, that the President does not represent the majority of the Republican Members of Congress of the other House, he does not represent a majority of the Republican membership of the United States Senate, and I believe that the Senator from Idaho will agree with me that he does not represent the sentiments of a majority of the Republicans in this Nation.

Mr. BORAH. I presume I am permitted to remain silent upon that subject. I did not suppose two months ago that the President represented a majority of the Republicans in this particular matter, but the kaleidoscopic change is such that I am unwilling to become a prophet at this time. I am not sure just exactly what strength the President represents. Neither am I sure of anything except that nearly all Senators are for this agreement, but none want it.

Mr. President, I want to read a single paragraph from the memoirs of John Sherman. I should like for all my Republican friends to listen, and especially the leader of the Republican administration, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. [Laughter]. Mr. Sherman says in the first volume of his memoirs, page 191:

> The dogma of some manufacturers that raw materials should be admitted free of duty is far more dangerous to the protective policy than the opposition of free traders. The latter contend that no duties should be levied to protect domestic industry but for revenue only, while the former demand protection for their industries, but refuse to give to the farmer and miner the benefit of even revenue duties. A denial of protection on coal, iron, wool, and other so-called raw materials will lead to the denial of protection to machinery, to textiles, to pottery, and other industries. The labor of one class must not be sacrificed to secure higher protection for another class. The earth and all that is within it is the work of God. The labor of man that tends to develop the resources buried in the earth is entitled to the same favor and protection as skilled labor in the highest branch of industry, and if this is not granted impartially the doctrine of protection proclaimed by the founders of our Government, supported for more than a hundred years of wonderful progress, will be sacrificed by the hungry greed of selfish corporations, who ask protection for great establishments and refuse to grant it to the miner, the laborer, and the farmer.

I wish we might heed it. I know it is true; you all know it is true; yet, sir, we are without the courage to do the right, even when we know the right.

That is a very wholesome piece of Republican philosophy.

I have very great sympathy, Mr. President, with the attitude of the newspapers in this fight. I am aware that they have been struggling and contending with a great corporation or combine which in a large measure controls the product which they need in their business. I presume that every right-thinking man has looked upon that subject in sympathy with the press of the country. That must necessarily be true with the "Progressives," because a "Progressive" can not refuse to sympathize with the press any more than a Mohammedan can pray with his face turned from Mecca. "The press is a part of the uplift."

But, Mr. President, what benefit will it be if, after all, this trust or combine should move north as rapidly as the Republican Party in its beneficence gives over our markets to foreigners? What hindrance will there be upon the part of this organization or combination to control all the additional raw material which we are seeking now to put into the market? By what means do we hope to secure relief against this combine operating in Canada, if we can not secure relief against it operating in our own country within the jurisdiction of our own laws? Instead of pouring more raw material in the hopper of the trust and exchanging the farmer's opportunity and his chance in the trade, why not deal with the combination itself? If, as has been stated in public several times, the real opposition to this reciprocity agreement comes from the Paper Trust and the Timber Trust, would it not be wise, knowing that they do exist, to deal with them as trusts and combinations, instead of undertaking to extend the area of their operation, for they can operate across the governmental line as easily as they can across a State line?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we would devote our attention to a suit, both civil and criminal, against the combinations, if they exist, which control this product, it would be far more effective to the newspapers and those who want to deal with them, and it would not be nearly so expensive to the agricultural interests of the country. But the fact is that Canada saw an opportunity to get into the American market, and she required that the American Government concede her entrance into this market before she would grant the favor which we seem to think will be of some benefit to us, and which, in my judgment, will not, in the long run, be any benefit at all. Instead, however, of dealing with the combination or the trust as a trust, we undertake to settle the trust question at the customhouse—a thing to my mind impossible. Instead of subjecting them to the criminal law and placing them where they ought to be, if they are exercising the power that it is claimed they exercise, we enter into an engagement with Canada by which, if they see fit, they can extend their operations and control the situation just as effectively after as they did before the agreement.

Mr. President, the only man who has never been in a trust and has never dealt with trust goods, except as he purchased them, who has never entered a combine, who has received the least benefit of all from the protective-tariff system, who has been removed farthest from its direct benefit, is the man who is to be visited with the discrimination in this instance in the hope of settling the trust question by tariff legislation, to wit, the American farmer. How can we justify in good conscience in beginning our attack upon the one who stands in the open field of competition, who is not in a combination to control prices—the farmer? We put him upon an absolute free-trade basis and then say that sometime in that far off and most illusive sometime we will deal with the real wrongdoer—the one who really fixes the price to the consumer.

Some 25 years ago both the Republican and the Democratic Parties began their campaign against trusts and combinations, seeking to devise laws and schemes by means of which they could control them or destroy them, and that campaign has continued from year to year until practically the present time. It was thought that if they could be destroyed or controlled competition would be restored to the American market place, and through competition prices would be brought back to a reasonable level. But, Mr. President, it seems that, after all, during all these years we have been mistaken; that trusts were not the cause of the high prices; that the combines were not the ones who were fixing toll upon the things which we eat; but the man who has been guilty of all these things which have led to the high cost of living has been the farmer out upon the ranch. Now, we have turned our attention from proceeding against the combines and trusts under the criminal law to putting the farmers' product upon the free list in the hope that by giving the trusts more raw material they will have compassion upon the consumer. This is one of the stupendous jokes of this era.

If it will not disturb some of my Republican friends, I think I shall read the view of a prominent Republican upon the matter of settling the trust question by the tariff. This is from ex-President Roosevelt. He was a good Republican at the time the present administration was elected:

> At the outset it is worth while to say a word as to the attempt to identify the question of tariff revision or tariff reduction with a solution of the trust question. This is always a sign of desire to avoid any real effort to deal adequately with the trust question. In speaking on this point at Minnesota on April 4, 1903, I said:
> "The question of tariff revision, speaking broadly, stands wholly apart from the question of dealing with the trusts. No change in tariff duties can have any substantial effect in solving the so-called trust problem. Certain great trusts or great corporations are wholly unaffected by the tariff. Almost all the others that are of any importance have, as a matter of fact, numbers of smaller American competitors; and, of course, a change in the tariff which would work injury to the large corporation would work not merely injury but destruction to its smaller competitors, and equally, of course, such a change would mean disaster to all the wageworkers connected with either the large or the small corporations. From the standpoint of those interested in the solution of the trust problem, such a change would therefore merely mean that the trust was relieved of the competition of its weaker American competitors and thrown only into competition with foreign competitors, and that the first effort to meet this new competition would be made by cutting down wages, and would therefore be primarily at the cost of labor. In the case of some of our greatest trusts such a change might confer upon them a positive benefit. Speaking broadly, it is evident that the changes in the tariff will affect the trusts for weal or for woe simply as they affect the whole country. The tariff affects trusts only as it affects all other interests. It makes all these interests, large or small, profitable, and its benefits can be taken from the large only under penalty of taking them from the small also."
> There is little for me to add to this. It is but 10 years since the last attempt was made, by means of lowering the tariff, to prevent some people from prospering too much. The attempt was entirely successful. The tariff law of that year was among the causes which in that year and for some time afterwards effectually prevented anybody from prospering too much and labor from prospering at all. Undoubtedly it would be possible at the present time to prevent any of the trusts from remaining prosperous by the simple expedient of making such a sweeping change in the tariff as to paralyze the industries of the country. The trusts would cease to prosper, but their smaller competitors would be ruined and the wageworkers would starve, while it would not pay the farmer to haul his produce to market. The evils connected with the trusts can be reached only by rational effort, step by step, along the lines taken by Congress and the Executive during the past three years. If a tariff law is passed under which the country prospers, as the country has prospered under the present tariff law, then all classes will share in the prosperity. If a tariff law is passed aimed at preventing the prosperity of some of our people, it is as certain as anything can be that this aim will be achieved only by cutting down the prosperity of all of our people.

Mr. President, I want to talk for a few moments about the father of reciprocity.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, may I interrupt my colleague before he leaves that phase of the matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. My memory just went back in connection with the extract from the speech being read by the Senator to 1900, which is not very far, and I thought I remembered a plank in a platform of a great party which runs:

> Tariff laws should be amended by putting the products of trusts upon the free list to prevent monopoly under the plea of protection.

That is from the Democratic platform of 1900, and it is well enough to remember it.

Mr. BORAH. I was talking to the family to-day, and not to the opposition. I want to settle this question among ourselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I want to talk for a few moments about the father of reciprocity. I would not detract from anybody's glory, and I am not intending to do so, but the real author of reciprocity in this country of late years is Mr. James J. Hill. I speak of Mr. Hill with the utmost respect because I think he is not only a great railroad man but a great man in other respects. He is a man of wonderful ability both as a railroad builder and, as has been said, an "empire builder"—a man whose capacity and intellect goes far beyond the question of the manipulation of stocks and the construction of railroads. I speak of him in this connection as a matter of history and not for the purpose of attacking him. He is entitled to his views. In my judgment, to him belongs the success, in a large measure, for the movement for reciprocity in this country within the last five years. He has been an advocate of it in season and out of season; he has furnished all the arguments I have ever, as yet, heard advanced in its behalf. However great a man Mr. Hill is, we ought to remember that the success of his great railroad system depends in a large measure upon the chance of hauling Canadian products to our markets. He was the man who invented the argument that by putting the farmer's product upon the free list you could reduce the cost of living without reducing the cost of the farmer's product. I am sure that no mind, except the ingenious mind of Mr. Hill, would ever have conceived of the proposition that you could reduce the cost of living by putting the farmer's product upon the free list without reducing the price of the product to the farmer.

This required a bold genius as well as some audacity. He has both. He is also the author of the argument that while the products which would be brought from Canada would be so small and of such a minimum amount that they would not affect the price to the farmer, yet they would be so large and so immeasureable that it would make it impossible for the speculator to control and corner the market. This class of arguments, which will fit in one locality or to one audience and then, stated differently, be usable in another locality, will be found in his many articles upon the question of reciprocity.

He published a book some two years ago. Among other subjects he treated the subject of reciprocity with Canada. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read the entire book, but I should like to read some parts of it:

> Since the episode of Maximilian our interest in Mexico has been scarcely more than a friendly observation of growth along lines so different, in the main, from our own that the question of conflicting interests could scarcely arise. On the north has arisen a confederation so closely akin to us in all respects, so remarkable in recent expansion and promise, so well worth taking note of either as a helper or a competitor in American continental development, that the question of our trade relations with the Dominion of Canada is one of the most practical issues of the day.
> The interests of these two peoples are as similar as the territories which they occupy. Place a pair of dividers, with one leg on Chicago and the other at Key West, swing the latter to the northwest, and it will not reach the limit of good agricultural land. Nature knows no artificial boundaries. "Classing the United States and Canada together," says Mr. Edward Atkinson, "occupying nearly the whole continent, it may be observed that the English-speaking people of this vast domain will constitute the only great nation producing a large excess of every kind of food that is essential for the support of life." Here are to be found, also, the largest known deposits of nearly all the useful metals, much precious ore, the greatest existing body of valuable and accessible timber, and other natural resources. No parallel of latitude marks where one form of wealth ends. The great central plain of North America is a physical unit. The characteristic and imposing feature of the interior of this continent is its material integrity. The two countries have identical languages, customs, usages of trade, and agencies for development. In all that relates to their progress there is a natural oneness and necessary harmony as obvious as the unbroken extent of land that stretches north to the limit of settlement.

How familiar those sentences sound to those who have been listening to or reading public speeches in favor of this question. Who ever supposed that this vision, which encompasses an English-speaking continent bound together in bonds of brotherly love, had its origin in the mind of a rugged railroad builder, whose railroads lead from Canadian fields to American markets. Perish the thought. That vision from the empyrean could never have originated in so materialistic a realm.

And what has this sturdy young neighbor of the North put into a partnership?

And then, without going into the long list of figures which he gives, I read again from page 94:

The agricultural interest in both countries would benefit by freedom of markets. Our cities afford a market for everything that the Canadian farmer can furnish. His breadstuffs, cattle and meat supplies, butter, cheese, eggs, and wool would reach new consumers.

That is, the Canadian farmer.

In 1906 Canada exported to the United States 3,831,988 bushels of wheat, valued at $2,981,608, according to her official statistics. This is an average price of 77 cents per bushel. In the same year the United States exported 34,973,291 bushels of wheat, valued at $28,757,517, or an average price of 82 cents per bushel, according to her official statistics. The average price of No. 2 red winter wheat that year in the New York market was 86½ cents per bushel. This difference is not always the same, nor does it exist at all times; but it is true that the price on the American side is usually from 3 to 5 cents greater than on the Canadian. Would this prospective gain to the Canadian farmer involve a corresponding loss to the farmer of the United States? Not at all. The time has now arrived when the home demand for many of the products of the soil is greater than he can supply.

And yet, Mr. President, those who are interested in this subject and will turn to another subject in this book will find that he gives the facts and figures to show that the American people can produce, if they are minded to use the land which is here at hand to be used, from twice to three times the amount of wheat we are producing now, and he shows that we can produce sufficient wheat to satisfy the home market when we shall have arrived at a population of 200,000,000 people.

Mr. President, that is one of the prime objections, to my mind, to this entire proposition. The untold millions of acres of agricultural land not now under cultivation which would be placed under cultivation if proper inducement were had in the way of prices is far more desirable than that we should trade with the foreigner who produces the same class of articles.

The American manufacturer has no better customer than the American farmer. He will sell more to an American farmer than he will to a Canadian farmer. The American farmer will not only purchase more, but he helps to sustain the burdens of American government. Can there be any possible doubt that any proposition which would tend to send the farmer across the line would be a detriment to the American manufacturer in the end? Would he not rather deal with a hundred farmers upon this side than a hundred farmers upon the other side?

The time has now arrived when the home demand for many of the products of the soil is greater than he can supply.

Mr. President, that is almost the exact language used by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] the other day, when he said that he was of the opinion that heretofore the farmer had not received very much direct benefit from the protective tariff. Not, said the Senator, at least, until late years. With what wonderful accuracy of language and with what remorseless logic the Senator from New York states the real infamy of this legislation! The American farmer has not received any benefit except incidental benefit from the protective-tariff system until within the last few years and since the demand in the home market is becoming sufficient to raise the price of his products to that point where he can secure a competency and realize something from the system which he has loyally sustained—since that period has arrived the selfishness of the great manufacturing centers propose to take from him his long-deferred profits. And a more accurate and complete indictment against this agreement could not and has not been stated than that which was contained in the single sentence of the Senator from New York.

It seems to me that the Republican organization is now in a position where it must either recognize the falsity of the economic principles which it has been preaching and the economic principles which it has announced for 40 years, or admit that this is a cold and brutal betrayal of the most loyal constituency that a party organization ever had.

If it be true that the farmers have stood loyal as they have to this organization for 40 years, in the hope and in the belief that they would build up an American market place close to their homes from which and by which they could realize a competency, and if it further be true that just as that is being realized and conceded it is to be traded off and turned over to foreign producers, there is no page of political history from Sir Robert Peel to this hour that is equal in its betrayal by the Republican Party of this great rural, loyal constituency.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it interrupt my colleague——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. To call attention to something within the family.

In the last national platform on which this administration went into power it is written under the head of "The Farmer":

Among those whose welfare is as vital to the welfare of the whole country as is that of the wageworkers is the American farmer. The prosperity of the country rests peculiarly upon the prosperity of agriculture. The Republican Party during the last 12 years has accomplished extraordinary work in bringing the resources of the National Government to the aid of the farmer, not only in advancing agriculture itself, but in increasing the conveniences of rural life.

That is within the family.

Mr. BORAH. I thank my colleague.

Mr. President, I agree with the bold figure of speech used by the gifted Senator from Oklahoma the other day when he said that the veil of the temple of protection has been rent in twain from top to bottom. But the rending of the temple was made possible not by outward enemies, though they gave aid and comfort; it was made possible by a base and venal betrayal for 30 shekels of silver—by a betrayal from one who had been a follower and a disciple. The eastern manufacturer, standing in the midst of the American market place, an advocate and a disciple of this system, its first and greatest beneficiary, in his selfishness and greed, covets his 30 additional shekels of silver and betrays the only system which offers him salvation. But I remember also following this figure further; that after the veil of the temple was rent asunder; after they parted the garments and cast lots; after there was darkness and desolation and despair upon the face of the earth from the sixth to the ninth hour; after Judas had brought his 30 shekels of silver and thrown them upon the temple floor and had gone and hanged himself; then came the resurrection morning; and the veil of the temple was restored and stands unshaken until this day. All this, sir, we may have to endure, and I believe we shall. But in the end the American laborer will not be placed upon the same basis with the foreign laborer; American citizenship will always mean more than the citizenship of other countries. In the end the home market will belong alone to the American producers. The inequities of the system will be adjusted, but its principles maintained.

Mr. President, one thing is just as certain as time marks progress—that the protective-tariff system will stand as a whole or it will fall as a whole. The Senator from New York said that those who represented the agricultural States would in time forget their revenges and vote for the general good of the country. The Senator will not be permitted to put it upon the ground of revenge. The basis of the condemnation will be its injustice, that when you take away from the American producer the American market place and trade it to a foreigner the cornerstone of this great system has been taken out and it will fall just so surely as that transpires. There is only one hope against that proposition, and that is the fact that this scheme, which would so barter away the home market, will have only a short life to live.

Mr. President, it can not be too often stated that the protective policy is a system. It is especially important to bear this in mind at a time when we have before us the distinct proposition of discriminating against a certain class of our people and still seemingly nursing the delusion that we can maintain the protective policy as such. If protection is to be confined to this or that particular article or schedule, if it is to be so applied as to reach to a certain class and to the disadvantage of other classes of our citizens, if the manufacturer is to have its benefits and the farmer denied, it then becomes nothing more than a privilege, and a privilege is always wrong.

If it be true that under protection as a system we build up and diversify our industries, diversify and specialize labor, and thereby increase the compensation of labor; if it be true that it establishes a home market for the surplus products of the soil and thereby serves both the producer and the consumer, it can well be justified and defended as a great national policy. But if it is to be used to build up one class at the expense of another; if the manufacturer is to be protected and the agriculturist not; if the home market is to be built up, not for the American farmer but for the foreign agriculturist, then it is an outrageous privilege and can not be defended and will not long be maintained. The latter proposition makes perfectly consistent those who are advocating reciprocity but who do not believe in protection. There is no better way to destroy protection than by reciprocity as to competing products. It must either be a system and so applied as to benefit all classes and include the whole country or it is not justified upon any right theory of government whatever.

The real foes of the protective policy are those who would make an exception in favor of or against a particular industry. There is nothing either in constitutional law or in morals by which you can properly lay a tax to sustain an industry or to enable an industry to live when otherwise it could not live, and thereby, in a sense, tax one individual for the benefit of another, except upon the theory that as a policy or system it develops our natural resources, diversifies our industries, gives employment to the different dispositions and desires of men, and creates and maintains a home market for the products of the soil. Upon any other principle the protective system is a wrong, if not a fraud. Those who argue for free raw material or free products from the farm, and still seek to maintain protective duties upon manufactured goods, belong to that class of people who are perfectly willing to see the Government used to the aggrandizement of one class over another. But their selfishness is not their most striking peculiarity or quality, because their shortsightedness is a more distinguishing trait than that of their selfishness. While the temporary or immediate effects will press more severely upon one class of our people than others, in the end such a one-sided, narrow, selfish, and shortsighted policy will impoverish all lines of industry by destroying the entire system. If there is anything for which the original founders of the protective policy contended above all others it was that it should be treated as a system and that the home market should at all times belong to the American producer.

It was one of the cardinal principles of the protective theory from the beginning that the home market was extended and steadied by protection and that this home market was to serve the agricultural interests of the country, that manufacturers were necessary and essential for the agriculturalist, and that, upon the other hand, agriculture was indispensable for the success of the manufacturer. I call attention to some statements from some of the leading spirits upon this subject from the beginning. Alexander Hamilton said:

> This idea of an extensive domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil is of the first consequence. It is of all things that which most efficiently conduces to a flourishing state of agriculture. * * * To secure such a market there is no other expedient than to promote manufacturing establishments. Manufacturers, who constitute the most numerous class after the cultivators of land, are for that reason the principal consumers of the surplus of their labor. * * * It is a maxim well established by experience that the aggregate prosperity of manufactures and the aggregate prosperity of agriculture are intimately connected. Perhaps the superior steadiness of the demand of a domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil is alone a convincing argument of its truth.

No one has ever added anything to the argument of Alexander Hamilton in favor of the American protective tariff system. Indeed, it is not too much to say that all the great speeches which have ever been made upon the subject are in some measure an amplification of that famous report made by Mr. Hamilton when he was Secretary of the Treasury. It was the wont of his marvelous intellect to exhaust whatever subject it deigned to touch.

Benjamin Franklin said:

> Every manufacture encouraged in our own country makes a home markets and saves so much money to the country that must otherwise be exported. * * * It seems to the interest of all our farmers and owners of land to encourage home manufactures in preference to foreign ones imported from different countries.

Thomas Jefferson said:

> We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist.

Jefferson was an agriculturist, not only theoretically, but in fact an agriculturist.

The above statement of Mr. Jefferson contains a vast amount of philosophy. If it were not for the healthy, wholesome life of our agricultural regions, if the politics of the country were throughout as corrupt as they are in the great centers of population, our Government would not survive half a century. The farm not only supplies the city with food, but it is a remarkable fact that the farm supplies the city with brains and character. If it were not for the constant accession from the farm to the city of young men, the effect would be felt not only in business and in politics, but in the stature of the citizenship in a decade. The finest eulogy ever written upon one class of people is the eulogy upon the agricultural class contained in Who's Who in America. If you will take up that volume you will find that 75 per cent of the men in this Chamber and in high official life were born and reared upon a farm. You will find 95 per cent of the editors of the great cosmopolitan dailies born either upon a farm or in country villages; and of the lawyers and great merchants and railroad operators you will find an average of over 75 per cent. So the declaration of Mr. Jefferson was not only one touching the economics, but it is one of great wisdom, covering every feature of national life.

Again, Mr. Jefferson says:

> My idea is that we should encourage home manufactures to the extent of our own consumption of everything of which we raise the raw material. * * * I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends upon a due balance between agriculture, manufacture, and commerce.

Henry Clay, in the great debate of 1824, said:

> The greatest want of civilized society is a market for the sale and exchange of the surplus of the produce of the labor of its members. * * * The home market is first in order and paramount in importance. * * *

Again he says:

> Agriculture is our greatest interest. It ought to be ever predominant. All others should bend to it. And in considering what is for its advantage we should contemplate it in all its varieties of planting, farming, and grazing. * * * Still cherishing the foreign market, let us create also a home market to give further scope to the consumption of the produce of American industries.

Mr. McKinley said:

> The home market, created by increased manufactures, encouraged by protective tariff, has changed the condition of the agriculturists of the country to their advantage and profit whether they grow cotton or corn, wheat or wool. This system has given to the farmers the best domestic market anywhere offered. * * * There is no portion of our people except labor which would be so seriously affected in income and profits from the policy of free trade as the farmer.

How much worse, then, is free trade to the farmer and protection to the manufacturer?

> * * * Nothing can be so disastrous to the American farmer as the surrender of the home market for the farm. * * * The value of every farm is increased by its nearness to a manufacturing center which is a home consumer. * * * The closer you can bring the field of production to the field of consumption the better it will be for the purchaser and the consumer.

Mr. Webster said:

> If by an importation of British manufactures we encourage the production of the articles manufactured in Europe rather than in America and bringing the goods here to the United States, is that not certain to diminish the number of consumers. So that after all it comes to this, whether it is better for our agriculturists to have the home market than to have a foreign market.

Now, I should like to ask my Republican brothers where is there to be found a page, a paragraph, a line in any Republican platform or any Republican document from the beginning of the party to the present time that is not in condemnation, not only not in support but in condemnation, of this policy or this measure which we are now discussing.

I wait, Mr. President, for some Republican to rise in his place and set before the Senate a single principle advocated at any time by any administration in support of this agreement which is now placed here to be passed without a single amendment.

The administration now in power came into power under a solemn pledge to protect the American market for the American farmer and to increase the market of the American farmer.

Senator ROOT, a leader in the last administration, Republican leader in this administration, declared in his great speech in the convention in 1904 that it was the pledge of the Republican Party, among other things—

> To increase the profit of the farmer's toil, to protect the farmer's product and extend his market, and to improve the condition of the farmer's life.

How does that harmonize with his effort to decrease the farmer's profit, to take away the farmer's protection, and to destroy the farmer's market, and to make harder the condition of the farmer's life? Every single proposition stated in that brief paragraph is now controverted by our present plans.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. No Republican seems disposed to accept the Senator's challenge to the effect that no Republican platform or speech or document ever sanctioned this treaty. I want, in the interest of accuracy, to call his attention to the fact that the President of the United States, whom the senior Senator from Idaho said came into power—I did not precisely understand why he wanted to distinguish between election and coming into power; it may be that he did not intend any distinction—but that President elected, as I say, coming into power, as he says, in two messages has advocated this, and in his first message understood it to mean just what the Senator from Idaho so well explained its meaning to be, for he said that necessarily the effect of this treaty upon the cost of living must be confined to food products and forest products, and he desired and intended that this treaty should reduce the price of agricultural products; and while he may not be exactly as stalwart a Republican as some from whom the Senator from Idaho has been reading, he is still a Republican and practically certain to be the next Republican nominee, although I hardly think the next Republican President——

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Texas does not want to go any further than the nomination. If the prophecy closes there then there is little consolation in it to a Republican.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I stop at the nomination.

The Senator is about to go on without commenting on the fact that here is a Republican in a State paper, which must be called a Republican document, who does not only advocate this treaty, but gives the very reason for its passage which the Senator from Idaho so severely, and, as I think, so properly, condemns.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my citation only went to the coming in of the present administration?

Mr. BAILEY. You stop at that?

Mr. BORAH. I stop at that. There has since arisen one who knoweth not Joseph.

Mr. BAILEY. Then Joseph will not know him when the time comes.

Mr. BORAH. I read an editorial published in the last campaign. I read only a part of it. It is from the Inter-Ocean under date of October 16, 1908, while the battle was on:

The Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, after a speaking tour through Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska, expresses the conviction that Mr. Taft is sure of those three States. That is a matter of opinion. However, few will seriously question the accuracy of Mr. Wilson's judgment, except, possibly, with respect to Nebraska. Mr. Wilson adds: "The one thing that will hold the farmers in line for Mr. Taft is the tariff policy of the Republican Party. The farmer does not want a revision of the tariff that ultimately means free trade."

The farmer certainly never understood that there was any possibility of having free trade as to him and protection to the American manufacturer.

Mr. McKinley said in another place, if I may be permitted to go back prior to the late dispensation:

The farmer finds among the employees of protected industries his best and most reliable customers.

* * * * * * *

Is not New England worth preserving?

How long have we heard that out West?

Is not the industrial system which makes such a community of consumers for agricultural products possibly worth maintaining?

We think so. We beg you not depart.

Does not she furnish you a market worth fostering? * * *

That is when we were talking to the American farmer.

The foreign market for agricultural products is one of the delusions of free trade. * * * Do the agriculturists want the duties removed and their products driven from this market.

Or would they prefer to have the home market sustained and supplied by the foreign producer?

I want to quote a few more declarations from the record of the Republican Party. I quote at random from different campaign books and campaign documents, although I have all of them here upon my desk in case any special information is desired.

If by reversal of our policy the home market is destroyed, where on the face of the earth will the farmer turn to dispose of his products?

Again, and this is found in the campaign book of 1904 and previous campaign books:

The new tariff gives Canada all she wants, without surrendering anything.

This has reference to the Wilson bill, for which we severely condemned it.

Again, I find in the campaign book of 1894:

What answer can be made to the intelligent farmers of Wisconsin, who find that their potatoes are protected from the vegetable growers of Canada by a duty of 20 per cent, while the toothsome peanut of the Old Dominion is sheltered by a protection of 73 per cent.

Upon page 157 of the campaign book of 1894 you will find an exhaustive discussion of the great detriment to the American farmer of free trade with Canada and a thorough denunciation of the Democratic Party for its position on the subject. The whole matter is dealt with in detail.

Upon another campaign document used in the last three campaigns I find the following:

Why should the market for farmers' products be turned over to people who live in other countries? When the Canadian farmers and millers have thus secured free access to our markets for all they can produce, our own farmers and millers must look for a market for their products that have been displaced by Canadian products.

We have gone before the people with such argument campaign after campaign.

Speaking of the Wilson bill, in a document issued by the national Republican organization, it says:

The present law is in the interest of the stock raiser of Canada. Under the McKinley Act there was a specific duty of $30 per head on horses valued at less than $150 and 30 per cent ad valorem on all that were valued at $150 or over. Now, what must be the inevitable effect of this on the American horse raiser?

And so I might proceed indefinitely.

In this connection I desire to call attention to what Mr. Laurier thinks as to what they will be able to do when they get possession of the American market. Says the premier:

We are above all an agricultural people; our chief wealth is the growth of those products of the Temperate Zone, fruits, cereals, and vegetables; and it is our boast—but a boast founded on actual experience—that in cereals, vegetables, and fruits we can, without exaggeration, beat the world. At the northern extremity of the Temperate Zone our cereals have more strength, our fruit has better flavor, our vegetables have more delicacy than similar productions from other parts of the world; and under free competition, not barred in any way by tariff legislation, they will displace all other products on the tables of the wealthy.

Where will the American farmer be when the tables of New England and the tables of the wealthy are supplied by the Canadian farmer, when the partnership is formed between the manufacturing centers of the East and the Canadian producer, and when the Canadian railroad magnate lowers his rate of freight from the point of production to the point of consumption in order to control the business of this country? Where will the western producer and the entire great Northwest be in that struggle for existence? You are not only making a partnership unknown to any principle which we have ever advocated, but by reason of the control of transportation by a government which we can not control to fix rates you may turn every dollar of the production of western Canada into the eastern market at a price which it will be impossible for the western producer to compete with.

Our object to-day is to open the door of the American market, to open the door of a nation of 90,000,000, which has been closed to us for the last 50 years.

If this tariff does not protect the American farmer, if it does not give him the home market, if it is a delusion, as has been stated, why has not the Canadian farmer come into the American market and occupied it? Could there be any more conclusive proof of its protection to the American producer than the fact that it has kept out the Canadian producer?

It would not be nearly so bad, Mr. President, if the American consumer was going to get the benefit of it. The American farmer might enter upon his ledger a debit to philanthropy if he knew the American consumer was going to get the benefit of it. But with the American markets placed in the absolute control of corporations, combines, and trusts, is anyone so deluded as to think that the price will be reduced to the consumer the value of a cent?

When we were passing the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, the East came to us with one of those pathetic pleas so characteristic of it. They said, Take the tariff off hides. Give us free hides and we will give you cheaper shoes and cheaper leather goods. They plead with western men to consent to take the tariff off hides. We were at that time collecting two and a quarter million dollars revenue upon hides. We took the tariff off hides. We lost two and a quarter million dollars to the Treasury. What as to the price of shoes and leather goods? Instead of going down, the prices went up. The two and a quarter million dollars went into the hands of the importer or manufacturer or the foreign producer.

So it will be here. By the time the wheat gets beyond the flouring mill and the steer gets beyond the Meat Trust and the other raw material reaches the table or the wearing of the American consumer, do you not think he will ever know that the reciprocity agreement has gone into effect? Perhaps he will be consoled by that philosophy which has perfumed the atmosphere of this Chamber when every other argument was exhausted, that we want to live upon the basis of brotherly love and brotherly affection with our brethren of the North.

The Premier says further:

We have in the Province of Quebec natural meadows, which require no tillage, and upon which the best of timothy has been grown, not for 50 years, but for 100 years. All along the two shores of Lake St. Peter there are natural meadows, a few inches only above the level of the water, which are yearly flooded, and which, to the knowledge of everyone in the Province, have been for a hundred years or more growing hay and nothing else. The counties of Berthier, Montmorency, and St. Maurice, on the north shore, and the counties of Nicolet, Yamaska, and Richelieu on the south, are so situated that they have a very considerable population who are growers of hay and for whom this treaty, if it becomes law, will be a most positive boon.

How will it be a positive boon to the Canadian producer unless it is a positive injury to the American producer, when both are engaged in the same business, applying for the same market, and selling the same products? Again, we come back to the proposition of living in a rarified state of brotherly affection with the brethren on the north.

To-day they can not sell any hay in the United States because there is a duty of $4 a ton.

Yet we find men upon this side of the Republican line so exhilarated by that feeling of brotherly affection that they say protection does not protect the American farmer. What does the Premier of Canada think about it? What does the Canadian farmer think about it? What does the actual practical experience of 50 years show in regard to it?

Let the duty be removed, and then immediately there will be an immense trade in that section of the community, as there was some 30 years ago. The same thing applies in the case of eggs, poultry, and mining products. For this reason it is to our advantage that we should have not only the British market but the American market also.

* * * * * * *

This agreement is concerned chiefly with natural products. There are no manufactured products dealt with in this agreement except agricultural implements. There is a vast difference between reciprocity in natural products and reciprocity in manufactured goods.

It would not appear necessary to say that, it would seem, on the part of the premier if he had not, perhaps, observed such intellectual obtuseness upon this side of the line in regard to that question:

This is the reason we have acted with this prudence. I do not know who was present at the conference which took place between our two representatives and Mr. Knox, but it is not a great effort of imagination to suppose that the Americans were far more concerned about obtaining reciprocity in manufactured products than they were in natural products.

In calling the proposed trade agreement reciprocity it is introduced favorably to thousands of people upon the assumption that the agreement involves the principle of reciprocity as advocated by Mr. Blaine and ex-President McKinley. Nothing could be further from the truth. It is the very reverse of the principle as announced by those distinguished advocates of this economic policy. They would exchange noncompetitive products, and those alone. This provides for the exchange of competitive products, and those alone. The farmer's strongest and most successful competitor is given free access to our market and the farm products of our own country must be brought into direct competition with the farm products of Canada. This principle Blaine condemned in no uncertain terms. He not only condemned the principle, but he condemned the specific proposition of reciprocity with Canada. It was his theory that all competitive products should carry a duty and that those things which we do not produce, and those only, should come in free under any reciprocity agreement. His policy was in direct aid of the protective theory—this policy is a direct attack upon the protective theory. It is not even tariff for revenue. We are so anxious to get at the American farmer that we will not give him the benefit of the incidental protection derived from a tariff for revenue only. In that respect it is just as much opposed to the Democratic principle as it is to the Republican principle.

So as to him there is applied the doctrine of absolute free trade, a doctrine which both Democrats and Republicans have either abandoned or denounced. No one in this day and age thinks free trade is a proper policy, but nevertheless we are placing the American farmer under the direct application of the doctrine of free trade. If we should apply the doctrine to all industries that we are now applying to the farming industry, this Government would not have revenue enough to pay expenses. If we should adopt the policy with reference to all industries that we are now applying to the agricultural industries, we would positively be without means of running the Government. It would not be so bad if we would hold on to the doctrine of tariff for revenue only. Then the farmer might get the benefit of incidental protection. But both parties with unseemly haste and with inconsiderate judgment have proceeded to apply a principle to the American farmer which everyone admits if applied to all would be destructive of the entire revenue system of government.

I call attention to some of the reciprocity announcements by former leaders of that policy. John Sherman said:

To grant to foreign nations the reciprocal right of free importation into our ports of articles which we can not produce in return for free introduction into foreign ports of articles of American production is reciprocity.

The platform of the Republican Party in 1900 read:

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

Mr. McKinley, in his inaugural address, said:

The end in view must always be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our people, but tend to increase their employment.

In his Buffalo speech McKinley said:

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt home production we shall extend the outlet of our increasing surplus.

* * * * * * *

We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

In the last campaign, in 1908, we circulated a campaign document containing this paragraph:

But so-called "reciprocity" in competing articles is a delusion and a snare. It necessarily and unavoidably means two things—either that we hand the other country a gold brick or that we abandon protection. The former would not be right, and the latter would not be wise. So we are unequivocally against it on both grounds.

That is the declaration upon which we were elected and upon which we came into power.

Again, I quote from the Republican Campaign Book:

Republican reciprocity is reciprocity in noncompeting articles, and nothing else.

President Arthur, in his annual message in 1884, said:

A series of reciprocal treaties with countries of America which shall foster between us and them an unhampered movement of trade. The conditions of these treaties should be the free admission of such merchandise as this country does not produce in return for the admission free or under a favored scheme of duties of our own products.

Again, I quote from the campaign book:

The American farmer objects to reciprocity restricted to natural products only. With good reason he objects to having all of the Canadian surplus of grain dumped on the American market. He knows that to remove the Canadian tariff from Canadian cereals would not only be disadvantageous to his interests now, but would in the near future help to build up a competition overwhelming in its magnitude.

There, Mr. President, is the broad, clear, distinct, emphatic proposition given to the constituency which placed the present administration in power. Who has been to the Isle of Patmos since that occurred, and where did this new revelation come from? If the Republican Party had the boldness and the courage to say that it has been in error, that protection does not protect the farmer, that it was an economic mistake, that would be one thing. But we are not meeting the proposition by undertaking to show that the policy which we have been advocating for 30 or 40 years is founded, as a matter of fact, upon a fallacy, but we are seeking by diaphanous argument to undertake to defend our position with the attitude of all the days that have gone by. We are undertaking to show that these things are capable of two constructions, when the language used is so plain and direct and so emphatic that it is impossible to misunderstand it.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] said the other day that the American farmer was unduly apprehensive of the injury which he might sustain. Who made the American farmer unduly apprehensive? How did he get his fear? How long has it taken us to convince him that he should be unduly apprehensive, and whose business is it to know whether his undue apprehensiveness is based upon fact or fallacy?

The time was in this Chamber, Mr. President, not very long ago, when the American farmer was not disputed with as to whether or not this kind of a policy would injure him. The very moment that he came into this Senate Chamber every Republican leader was quick to act as his advocate and defend his cause. But now, perchance because the farmer sees fit to call in the aid of a New York attorney to gather facts and present the statistics to the Republican Finance Committee, he is to be denounced from one end of the country to the other as acting in conjunction with trusts and combines and undesirable persons of all classes.

We have been the representative, the advocate, and the defender of the agricultural interests upon this floor for 40 years, and it never occurred to the American farmer before that until the whole fabric of the protective tariff system was torn down he would be taken out and placed outside of the system of protection. There has not been a note of warning sounded to him. No man would have dared to have gone into the last campaign and submitted to the voters of this country the proposition which is now before us. That proposition could not have been outlined or brought into this Chamber after any discussion before the American public. But it is here, without notice, without warning, without chance for amendment, on a simple hearing before a committee already bound to report the measure.

Finally, sir, let me say that one-half of the agricultural lands now in private ownership are not under cultivation. We can double our production. We have at least 75,000,000 acres of new lands well fitted for cultivation. We have at least 10,000,000 acres of swamp land, the richest in the world. We have yet several millions of arid lands. By proper farming, not to say scientific farming, we can double the acreage productiveness of our soil. We have the soil and the capacity to supply products for 250,000,000 people. Why quit this field and seek help from abroad? By attending to our agricultural interests at home we make new farms, new homes, more property to bear the burdens of taxation, and, moreover, we really shield our political institutions. To facilitate and encourage the food supply at home, to augment and encourage the agricultural interests of a people, is the highest statesmanship of these days.

The first symptoms of an approaching aristocracy is an attempt to discriminate against or a contemptuous neglect of the agricultural interests. The line that divides the period of strength, virility, and power from the period of luxury, weakness, corruption, and decay in the history of every great country is that which marks the neglect of the agricultural interests. An abandoned farm ought to cause more distress and worry to the statesmen than bad laws or unwise policies. An abandoned farm is a menace to our national institutions and a standing indictment against the wisdom of our national policies. The home market without the presence of the farmer is a foreign market. Think of a home market with a foreigner in possession of it. And the premier says he will take possession of it under this agreement. Think of the family fireside with the eldest boy, who has worked longest and hardest and waited most patiently to share the comforts of industry and frugality, turned aside and some "Weary Willie," or brother tramp, who never expended a dollar for the old home, in his place. This may be economy, but it is both immoral and unpatriotic.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 29, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTUGAL.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in the early part of the session, two or three months ago, I presented a resolution on the subject of the recognition of the establishment of a republic in Portugal, and had the resolution referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. No report has ever been made by that committee and, so far as I know or have been advised, no attention has been paid to the resolution. Nevertheless, I am glad to say that the executive department of the United States has finally recognized officially the Republic of Portugal, as shown by the cablegram which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without reading?

Mr. CULBERSON. Without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES RECOGNIZES PORTUGAL—REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT OF LAND FORMERLY RULED BY MANUEL IS UPHELD.

LISBON, June 19, 1911.

The United States has officially recognized the Republic of Portugal.

This followed the opening of the new constituent assembly this morning, at which the president of the chamber read a decree proclaiming the abolition of the monarchy and the banishment from Portugal of the royal family of Braganza, which was unanimously approved. The decree was also read by the president to the great throngs which gathered outside the assembly building.

George J. Lorillard, American chargé d'affaires, in the afternoon waited upon Sr. MacAdoo, minister of foreign affairs, and delivered a note which stated the United States officially recognizes the new Portuguese Government.

The day was observed as a public holiday throughout the whole country. Popular demonstrations in honor of the occasion were held everywhere, but no disorders are reported.

TREATY OF 1832 WITH RUSSIA.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations has treated another resolution which I introduced and had referred to the committee with the same inaction and inattention, so far as I know. On the 10th of April I reintroduced a resolution on the subject of the treaty between this country and Russia of 1832 which I introduced at the last session. After that I addressed a communication to the chairman of the committee calling his attention to the resolution and asking him the privilege of being heard by the committee when the matter was taken up. I had a courteous reply, saying in effect that I would be offered this privilege, but up to this time nothing further has been done, so far as I am advised, with reference to the resolution.

I wish to take advantage of this occasion to say that that resolution was introduced in good faith, that it means what it says, and that I trust I will not be placed in the disagreeable attitude of being compelled to move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution and bringing it before the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, in harmony with the remarks just made by the Senator from Texas, on a question that is of vital importance to the American Republic and of infinite importance as well to a great religious sect in our country, I ask permission to read the following editorial from the New York Evening Mail of Friday, June 23, 1911:

THE JEW AND THE FLAG.

It can not be that the cool minds in the Russian Government realize the danger in their attitude toward the American citizen who is a Jew. Can we express it, in all its splendid power that it has here, and not seem to Russia extravagant in language? The root idea of this Republic is absolute equality before the law. There is no other doctrine, in all our constitutional concept, that is comparable with this one doctrine. It is our life nerve. It is our very heartbeat.

Therefore the flag protects every law-abiding American the wide world over. The flag knows no Jew. It only knows the American citizen. The flag never reasons beyond that. Is he an American citizen? On every sea, as on every home village green, the flag means the same. Are we understood?

To understand us is a momentous thing. To understand us means taking account of our national spirit, of which it may not become us to boast. Yet the world pretty well understands it now—except possibly Russia. To understand us one needs to count our resources of every kind which are pledged to the maintenance of our national doctrine to the last.

In other words, we indignantly, not to say angrily, protest against Russia's distinction as to religious belief between American citizens. Such distinction we do not ourselves make at the ballot box. Nor will we brook it made wherever our American citizen travels under the flag.

The flag was carried by Jews on many a bloody field. But we did not know them as Jews. These soldiers of our cause were more. They were our brothers. There was a wide and varied brotherhood. The consecration seemed to rise higher than church steeples, higher than incense from any altar. It was the American spirit, like the sky over us. And, like the eternal sky, it lives.

Quite likely our language will seem the utterance of excitement. On the contrary, it is the coldest possible. It may be necessary for that great nation, whose friendship we have always had, to look us anew in the face and read us. While the Republic lives it recoils, as from a snake, at the sight of anything contrary to absolute equality of rights and freedom of conscience among us or about us, before the law, under the flag.

I respectfully ask that this editorial may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Having been read, it will appear in the RECORD.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTUGAL.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations I wish to say a few words in reply to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], but of course I yield to the chairman if he desires to be heard.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say only a word.

Mr. BACON. I will wait until the Senator has finished. He is entitled to precedence.

Mr. CULLOM. No; go ahead.

Mr. BACON. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations I desire, with all due deference, to say that I do not recognize that the Senator from Texas has any cause for the grievance which he presents to the Senate or that there is any foundation for it.

The Senator is in error when he says that his resolution received no attention on the part of the committee. It received very careful attention and very careful consideration. The committee proceeded in a way which it thought was the proper way, and which I as an humble member of that committee think was the proper way, and which I am certain the Senate will think was the proper way.

The situation was a somewhat unusual one. It was not the case of a question whether or not the independence of a country should be recognized. That is a very much more radical question than the question as to whether or not the constituted government, or rather one claiming to be a constituted government, shall be recognized as the legitimate and permanent government of a country.

The Republic of Portugal never, up to the time of the introduction of the resolution of the Senator from Texas, and never, so far as I know, up to this time, accredited any representative to this Government. At the time of the occurrence of the revolution in Portugal there was an accredited representative of the Government of Portugal, sent here by the government which was overthrown by the revolution.

He appeared here at this post as the representative of that country. He came here as the representative of the monarchical government which had been overthrown. He remained here after the government was overthrown and was only recognized by the temporary republican government which succeeded the monarchy so far as to send dispatches and official communications from Portugal to the Government of the United States. In other words, holding the credentials of the monarchical government he was recognized by the new government only to the extent of being used as the medium for such diplomatic interchanges as were required.

Now, Mr. President, the committee thought—and, I think, properly thought—that until the Republic of Portugal itself accredited a representative to this Government it was not incumbent upon this Government to take any action upon the question as to whether or not the new government should be recognized as a constituent government, permanent in its nature, and one with which, as such, diplomatic relations should be technically and formally established.

Diplomatic relations were continued with the Government in the way in which I have mentioned. We had a minister there, and since the overthrow of the monarchy, we had appointed, by the President, after he was confirmed by the Senate, a minister to Portugal. It so happens that in the appointment of a minister to that country it is not necessary nor is it the form to credit him to any particular government, monarchical or republican, but he is accredited to that Government, and Mr. Boutelle, who has since been transferred, was appointed. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CULLOM. He was transferred to Switzerland.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Boutelle was nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate as the minister to Portugal, and he was commissioned and has since been transferred to Switzerland.

I simply mention this to show that there was no break whatever in the diplomatic relations of this country, and there was the informality growing out of the fact which I have mentioned, that the Government of Portugal itself recognized the government which the resolution of the Senator from Texas referred to as a temporary government. It had provided for the election of a constituent assembly, which was to determine upon the permanent form of the government and to elect permanent officers of that government.

At the time the Senator from Texas introduced his resolution there was no permanent government in Portugal claimed even by the Portuguese themselves. On the contrary, the Portuguese themselves announced to the world that they had a temporary government, and that they intended to form a permanent government when an election which had been ordered by them had been had and an assembly convened in accordance therewith. That election has been had since the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas, and that constituent assembly has assembled since the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas, and that constituent assembly has since that time elected permanent officers, and since that time the President of the United States has formally, so soon as the Government of Portugal itself claimed that it was permanent, so soon as it said to the world "We have established a permanent government and have elected permanent officers"—so soon as that was done the President of the United States formally recognized that permanent government and those permanent officers.

Now, Mr. President, while that was going on the committee had before it the resolution of the Senator from Texas. We were not indifferent to the resolution. We were not inattentive to the resolution. We were engaged in a proper, legitimate, and necessary investigation as to the facts. An investigation we properly made through the medium of the State Department. Pending that time a letter was had from the State Department setting forth substantially the facts which I have endeavored to recite, and that letter was shown to the Senator from Texas, and, if I remember rightly, it was not only so done, but, when the Senator from Texas again called attention to the fact, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who had been deputized by the committee to communicate with the State Department, offered that letter to the Senate and it was read from the desk. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CULLOM. That is right.

Mr. BACON. So, Mr. President, it seems to me to be a statement which can not really be defended that the Foreign Relations Committee failed to give attention to this matter. It not only gave attention to it, but I think gave it exactly the attention which should be given. It was not proper from the viewpoint of the committee, and I will say from the view that I took as an humble member of that committee, that in that condition of affairs the Senate should take a position that, before the Government of Portugal itself claimed that it had elected permanent officers, and before the Government of Portugal had itself sent us the accredited representative, we should insist that we should say to the people of Portugal, "You do not understand your business. You ought before this time to have organized a permanent government, and we, in view of the fact that you are going to be a republic, and you claim now to be a temporary republic, are impatient in this matter, and we insist that you permit us to recognize you as a permanent government when you do not yourselves claim to be such."

Now, I have but one other word to say in regard to the matter, Mr. President. If the Senator from Texas was dissatisfied with the act of the executive department the remedy was within his own reach. If the Senator from Texas was dissatisfied with the action of the Foreign Relations Committee the remedy was within his own reach as a Senator, not, as suggested to him, by a motion to discharge the committee, though, of course, that it was his province to do if he saw fit so to do, but the right to recognize a foreign Government is not exclusively with the executive department. That is a question which has been threshed out in the Senate a good many times; it has had Executive consideration. Away back from the time of Andrew Jackson, and in subsequent administrations, the right has been conceded by the executive department, and has always been claimed by the legislative department, if it saw fit, to recognize a government.

We have done so repeatedly, and could have done so again. Therefore, if the executive department was halting and failing to do its duty in recognition of this temporary government—a government itself only claiming to be temporary—if the Senate thought that the President was at fault in the matter, it was competent for the Senate itself to adopt a resolution and send it to the House of Representatives recognizing the Republic of Portugal, and it was equally within the right and province of the Senator from Texas to introduce a resolution to that effect.

Mr. President, I want to submit to the Senate whether or not the orderly procedure had not been the one which has led to the orderly result which all of us would have desired? There was a representative of the Government of Portugal here, through whom we were having diplomatic relations with Portugal, not accredited, it is true, by the republican government of Portugal, but recognized by that Government as the representative of that country, as I have previously stated, to the extent of sending dispatches and communications through him. We were not, by reason of the failure to anticipate the action of the Portuguese temporary government, interfering in any manner with any of our business or political or diplomatic relations; and by simply waiting the own good time of Portugal the time has come when Portugal has itself done what the world expected it to do, what we all wanted it to do, and what we are all gratified has been done, to wit, out of the revolution from which sprung this temporary government there has now grown, through the orderly processes of an election by the people and the assembling of the constituent assembly, the creation of a permanent republican government, with permanent republican officers; and doubtless within a short time either the present representative of that country, who was formerly accredited by the monarchical government, will receive new credentials from the new government and present them to the President, or some other man will be charged with that commission by the republican Government of Portugal. In the meantime our own representative is there fully accredited to that Government, whether it be a monarchical government or a republican government.

So, I think, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas does injustice to the Committee on Foreign Relations in the suggestion that there has been any want of attention to the resolution referred by him to that committee; that there has been any disposition to fail to acquaint him personally with what was being done by that committee and the attitude which it occupied, and that it had disregarded the mandate of the Senate through a resolution introduced by the honorable Senator.

Mr. President, as to the other matter, I do not desire to have anything particular to say on that subject. I presume that other members of the committee probably will be heard upon it. I simply desire to say that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] are no more thoroughly in earnest in the desire that the injustice done to the Jews by Russia shall be corrected than I am; and I know the committee is giving the matter the most serious and careful attention. These are not matters to be done hastily and hurriedly, without due reference to all the consequences which may follow. We know the fact that the treaty to which the resolution refers is the only treaty we have with Russia, and we desire to correct the evil; but we desire to correct it in such a way as not, while we serve one interest, to sacrifice all others. In due time and in good time it is the purpose of the Foreign Relations Committee, and the purpose of the Senate, and the purpose of this Government to carry out the purposes which are had in view by the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas and by the article read by the Senator from New Jersey. I will not go into detail as to that matter further than to say that it is a matter of the utmost gravity. I can not better illustrate or indicate its gravity than by the suggestion that while we seek to serve one interest we must not destroy others. And there are vast interests involved. I am in favor of proceeding in as effective a way as possible and proceeding as speedily as possible. But these things can not be done in a day, or a week, or a month; they are matters which necessarily proceed slowly, and must proceed with caution and care and with the utmost regard for the general interest as well as for the particular interest which it is sought to serve.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I have not much to say further than to confirm what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has said in reference to the affairs in Portugal. Those affairs have worked out satisfactorily, as we expected them to do, without any noise or fuss about them in the Senate or elsewhere.

As to the other question to which the Senator from Texas has referred, I want to say that we have not neglected that subject. It has been a source of very considerable interest on my part, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and of the committee as well. It has only been a question as to what we could safely do and what we have a right to do in the premises without doing, as the Senator from Georgia says, more harm than good.

I wish to say further to the Senator from Texas that I have conferred two or three times with the Secretary of State upon the question. For a time we thought we were going to get the matter settled without any trouble at all, but it seems to have broken out afresh. I do not know what we shall finally do, but I consulted with the Secretary of State only two or three days since in regard to the subject. He is using his best endeavors to do what he knows is to the interest of our own country and of the people who are affected. If the Senator from Texas will only be patient a little while longer, we hope we shall be able to make a report on the question which will be satisfactory to him and to everybody else. The truth is it is a question whether the people concerned in this treaty would not be affected injuriously if we are precipitate about what we do.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] evidently misapprehended what I said, or he fell into some mistake with reference to my attitude. I did not suggest that the Committee on Foreign Relations ought in the future to be discharged from the further consideration of the Portugal resolution; but I had reference in my statement in that respect to the resolution introduced on the subject of the treaty with Russia of 1832. The Senator is mistaken in supposing also——

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator from Texas, before he proceeds, that I did not misunderstand him as to the matter he has just mentioned.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well; let it go then at that.

The Senator misapprehends also the purport, as I think, of the resolution which I introduced and which has been pending in committee since the 6th day of April of this year. I did not propose that the Senate should undertake, by a simple resolution or a concurrent resolution, to recognize the establishment of a Republic in Portugal; but it was a resolution asking for information from the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, with reference to the establishment of the new government in Portugal.

I yield, of course, to the more familiar knowledge of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] with reference to foreign affairs; but, Mr. President, this resolution was drawn with some care, if I do say so, and it sought to secure from the President information upon which subsequently the Senate and the House of Representatives conjointly, if need be, could act with reference to this matter. Notwithstanding the information, superior to mine, which is possessed by the Senator from Georgia with reference to foreign affairs, I undertake to state that the best precedents of this Government are to recognize provisional governments of republics established in foreign countries and not to wait for the establishment of permanent governments. Now, let me read the resolution as to Portugal:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate whether the Republic so established has in operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power; and if so, whether the Republic has been officially and fully recognized by the executive department of the United States.

Manifestly, Mr. President, the only object of the resolution was to secure definite, distinct, and reliable information for the use of the Senate in any action which it might be proper to take thereafter; but, instead of reporting one way or the other the resolution asking for information, the committee has had it in its possession since the 6th day of April, and, so far as I know, with the exception of the letter which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] allowed me to read, nothing has been done with reference to the particular resolution which I introduced, which was not to declare a recognition on the part of the Senate or in connection with the House of Representatives of the existence of the Republic, but was to secure information upon which the Senate might, if it should see proper, act hereafter. I repeat that, in my opinion, the committee has taken entirely too long a time to answer a resolution of the Senate with reference to this information.

Mr. President, so much for the resolution on the subject of Portugal. With reference to the other resolution, the one as to the treaty of 1832 with Russia, I want to say that I introduced a similar resolution at the regular session—some time in March, I believe, but the date is not material; at all events it was at the last session—and I reintroduced it at this session, and accompanied the resolution, as I have heretofore said, with a letter to the honorable chairman of the committee, stating that when the committee saw proper to take up the resolution for consideration I should like to be heard in committee upon it.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say that when the resolution is taken up for formal consideration by the committee I shall do what I said I would do—that is, inform the Senator so that he can be heard before the committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the committee answered me very civilly and courteously in reply to my letter, that when that resolution was taken up for consideration by the committee he would notify me, and that I would have the privilege of appearing before the committee. Not having heard further from it, and seeing from the newspapers the subterfuge by which Russia undertakes to postpone action by this Government on the subject, I had a right, in view of the assurance of the distinguished chairman of the committee, to suppose that the committee had not taken it up for consideration.

I repeat what I said a moment ago—that it is a bona fide resolution. It intends what it purports to do, and I should regret exceedingly to be placed in the disagreeable attitude of being compelled, whatever may be the result of my efforts, to see that this resolution has attention on the part of the committee, and, if necessary, on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to repeat what I have already said—I think it is an answer practically to what the Senator has said in rejoinder—further than to call attention to the fact that the letter was not, as stated by the Senator from Texas, simply shown to him, but that the Senate had the full benefit of that letter, that it was read from the desk, and while I have, in probably a more diffuse way than would be justifiable, endeavored to state it, that letter did substantially set forth all the facts I have stated here, and particularly as to the facts that it was a temporary government; that it itself had never accredited any representative to this Government; that the people of Portugal were proceeding to form a permanent government; that that was expected soon to be accomplished; and, when accomplished, this Government would act as it has done.

Of course, Mr. President, nobody will for a moment suggest that the Senator from Texas had any other than serious motives in the introduction of the resolution. The Senator is recognized as a serious Senator; he introduces a great many resolutions; and we all recognize that all of them are with serious intent and entitled to the utmost consideration. The committee has never regarded the Senator's two resolutions in any other light than as extremely serious matters, and has given them the careful and deliberate attention and consideration which they merit on account of what they themselves express and on account of their very distinguished authorship.

HEARINGS ON RECIPROCITY BILL.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Finance I present hearings held before that committee on House bill 4412, known as the reciprocity bill, and also hearings on House bill 4413, known as the farmers' free-list bill. I ask that these hearings, arranged by subjects, be printed as separate Senate documents. (S. Docs. Nos. 56 and 58.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I want to inquire whether or not the index of the testimony taken at the hearings is complete. I have received a copy with an index showing only the names of those who appeared and the dates, but no such index as we have heretofore had is attached to it. Before those hearings are printed permanently they should be indexed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the hearings that I have presented here and asked to have printed as a public document everything is arranged by subjects matter. Every subject is arranged by itself, and everything said upon that subject is under that head; so that if you want to refer to any one particular subject it is there. The index, of course, shows who spoke upon that particular subject and the page of the hearings where it will be found.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but reference to subjects matter seems to me lacking in the index.

Mr. SMOOT. We have arranged it differently in the hearings which I have presented. It is now arranged so that every subject matter is by itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is all right. I was speaking with reference to a copy that was sent to my room.

Mr. SMOOT. Those were daily hearings, and what the Senator has said is true of the daily hearings; but these have been rearranged.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is quite important that they should have a carefully prepared index. Heretofore they have been indexed in a very excellent manner.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to state, for the information of the Senator from Idaho that copies of the hearings which have been in the possession of Senators are the first, second, and third prints of the document. Very great pains have been taken, however, to make the final print entirely accurate as regards the figures and statistics and the testimony of the more than 100 persons who were heard by the committee. In every case the testimony has been sent to the witness, with the request that he correct it. The index in this final print is not as thorough or as exhaustive as would ordinarily be made, but it is as much in detail as is practicable in view of the fact that it is so desirable to have these hearings out promptly for the use of Senators during the discussion of this question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I fully realize that, Mr. President. I have received one volume, so far as my attention has been called to it, of the corrected print. Now, I want to say in connection with that matter that, in my judgment, it is not profitable nor in the interest of accuracy that men should be given an opportunity to convert into an essay testimony that is obtained under the fire of examination, direct or cross. All lawyers have had experience with that matter, and it has been found utterly unwise to submit testimony to witnesses for their correction. The result is that you get an essay in lieu of the result of that class of examination that tests a man's veracity and his intelligence.

Mr. PENROSE. Very great care was taken by the editors of this publication that the testimony should not be altered into the essay character which the Senator apprehends. It is substantially the same. But on several days the confusion was so great, the number of witnesses so great, that very many errors crept in which it was very desirable and important to correct. These hearings are extremely valuable and cover a wide range of agricultural topics and will be found most useful to Members of the Senate in the discussion of this question.

OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send to the desk a letter and memorandum from the secretary of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE PHILADELPHIA MARITIME EXCHANGE,
Philadelphia, June 26, 1911.

Hon. FRANK D. BRANDEGEE,
Chairman Committee on Interoceanic Canals,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of action recently taken by the executive committee of this exchange in connection with pending legislation regarding the operation of the Panama Canal, and shall esteem it a favor if you will kindly have the same filed with your committee for its future consideration.

Yours, faithfully, E. R. SHARWOOD, Secretary.

PHILADELPHIA MARITIME EXCHANGE.

Concerning the enactment of legislation by the Congress of the United States to provide for the operation of the Panama Canal and to authorize the President to fix canal tolls the executive committee of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, at a meeting held the 12th day of June, 1911, unanimously adopted the following:

Whereas it is practically certain that by the autumn of 1913 the Panama Canal will be near enough to completion to permit it to be used by merchant shipping; and

Whereas steamship companies and others interested in the operation of vessels through the canal will require from 18 months to 2 years to prepare to use the canal, to terminate existing contracts, to provide new facilities, and to secure or build such additional ships as will be required to begin using the canal promptly; and

Whereas companies operating vessels either as common carriers or as large manufacturers and shippers can not definitely decide to prepare to use the canal until they know what tolls are to be charged for the passing through the canal, and thus know whether the canal route will be more economical than other routes: Be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urgently requested to pass a law at the present special session providing for the operation of the Panama Canal and authorizing the President to fix, within limits established by Congress, the tolls to be charged for the use of the canal by merchant shipping of the United States and of foreign countries.

A true copy.

[SEAL.] E. R. SHARWOOD, Secretary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, referring to the matter touched upon in the memorial just read, Col. Goethals, the engineer in charge of the Panama Canal, appeared before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce within a few weeks and stated at length the situation in the Canal Zone and the necessity for quick action upon the subjects mentioned in the memorial.

The situation in the House, if I may refer to it without being unparliamentary, as is well known and has been reported in the press, under the control of the dominant party there, is such, by reason of the caucus action of the dominant party, as I understand it, that there is no intention of taking up general legislation other than certain tariff matters, if I am correctly informed about that. I have made some inquiry of Members of the House, and am informed that there is no prospect of action being had upon this matter in the House at this special session.

I have also had several conferences with the President in relation to this matter, and he, of course, realizes the great importance of action at the earliest possible minute upon this matter. But in view of the present situation in the Senate, with the unfinished business privileged, after a conference with as many of the members of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals as I have been able to see, we do not think anything would be gained by attempting legislation in respect to this matter at this special session.

It seems idle for this body, even if it could, in view of the unfinished business, to take up this subject and debate it simply, if debate it requires, as a moot question, if no action whatever can be had in the House. Therefore, in accordance with the consensus of opinion of the committee and upon the assurance of the President that he did not think at this time it was wise for him to ask the Congress to take up this matter, I thought it was due the parties interested in shipbuilding, and those who desire to prepare themselves for the use of the canal, to make the statement that it was not probable that anything could be done at this special session, but that at the very earliest minute, when we reconvene next December, the Committee on Interoceanic Canals will take up this matter and proceed with it with the greatest possible expedition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter and memorandum will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. GAMBLE. On Monday morning last I gave notice that I would submit a few observations on the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes. I have been engaged this morning, and will be throughout the day, in connection with a committee, and to-morrow morning after the routine morning business, with the indulgence of the Senate, I shall be glad to address it on the subject.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to give notice that on next Thursday, a week from to-day, immediately following the morning business, I will submit some remarks upon the bill (S. 1) to establish a department of health, and for other purposes.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I say in beginning this morning that I hope that those Senators who favor this measure, and have believed it ought to pass without any amendment whatsoever, will do me the honor to hear a portion of what I shall have to say before I have finished; not that portion which relates to the merits of the amendments I have offered enlarging the free list so far as the United States is concerned, but to the portion which concerns the form of the proposed arrangement. I will show before I have concluded that no self-respecting nation can admit without qualification the agreement in the exact form in which it has been proposed to us, and that it must be modified if it is to accomplish the purposes which its authors had in view.

Mr. President, I believe that I feel the responsibilities of the position I occupy toward this measure more deeply than those upon the other side of the Chamber who are in favor of a complete reversal of our economic system, and more deeply than those upon this side of the Chamber who have favored the retention of the high duties which I have sought from time to time to reduce.

I believe that our tariff law should be revised. I believe that its duties should be reduced. I believe that many commodities upon which we now levy duties should be transferred to the free list. And believing those things, the injustice of the present arrangement impresses and affects me more deeply, as I think, than it can affect any Senator who desires to substitute some other system for the one we have heretofore adopted, or any Senator who believes that these duties of the protective tariff are what they ought to be.

Mr. President, the one thing that the people of a free country can not and will not endure is a sense of injustice at the hands of its government. We will pass through trials and hardships and poverty and misfortune with cheerful hearts and resolute courage. We do not expect and do not want equality of fortune. There always have been poor people and there always have been rich people, and there always will be poor people and rich people. We do not want to take from one that which he has justly earned in order to give it to another. The people of this country will not lose their abiding faith in free institutions, no matter what adversity may overcome them, until they reach the conclusion that the organized society of which they are members is not dealing fairly with them. Whenever any great part of our population comes to believe that the Government to which they owe their allegiance and the Government of which they are subjects is engaged in a scheme of injustice, then, indeed, will the day have come when we may look for a dissolution of our present relations to each other.

The fair and honest distribution of wealth is the great difficulty of the present time; it is the great problem of the present time. As every thinking, observing man knows, there is now in the minds of a great many of the people of this country a feeling that their Government is not doing what it ought to do to insure every man his opportunity, and is doing some things that it ought not to do, that unfairly affect the distribution of wealth, that we give to one man the profits of the labor of another; and I appeal to you with all the earnestness that can possess a loyal and patriotic heart that we must not intensify this feeling.

What are we to expect will follow the arrangement which is now proposed? I am not asking my Democratic friends to change their minds with regard to the proper kind of a tariff. They believe in a system which will levy duties for the revenues of the Government only. I am not quarreling with that at this time. I do not believe in that system. But it is so much better than the system or disorganized system that would ensue if this bill shall pass in its present form that I would instantly yield in submission to the revenue system rather than have such an one as will result if this bill passes without amelioration or modification.

Mark me, the people of this country, with their unerring judgment and with their high intelligence, will know who is responsible for subjecting the farmers of the country to the perils, whatever perils there are, of a free market in which to sell and holding them at the same time in the manacles of a protected market in which to buy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIVELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hold in my hand what purports to be an inaugural address of the Senator from Iowa, delivered when he was governor of the State of Iowa, on January 14, 1904, and there are a few words on page 9 of this pamphlet containing the alleged address which it strikes me are peculiarly pertinent to what the Senator from Iowa has just said. Would he yield long enough for me to read them?

Mr. CUMMINS. Gladly. I remember them very well, but I am very glad that other Senators here should know what they are.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was afraid the Senator had forgotten the concluding sentence of what I shall read.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can assure the Senator from Mississippi upon that point. I remember it very distinctly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that occasion the Senator from Iowa, then governor of that great State, said:

> Let us not be content with mere abstractions. It has been possible to make, and in my judgment it is still possible to make, a treaty with Canada which would for years to come make us practically masters of the imports into that Dominion. In the last 10 years American manufacturers have expended $100,000,000 in the establishment of plants in Canada which would have been kept at home, with all the labor which that implies, if there had been a fair and permanent relation existing between the two countries. Not only so, but every student of affairs knows that the chance we now have across the border will be completely destroyed unless we treat with our neighbors upon a fair reciprocal basis. The farmers of Iowa have lost something in the foreclosure of the opportunity to feed the men who are operating the plants to which I have referred, and they will lose more when Canada raises the barrier so that England, France, and Germany will supply the material for the wonderful development upon which she is just entering and which we are so well prepared to supply. It has been said that in order to obtain these changes it will be necessary for us to let into our markets Canada's agricultural products or some of them. I believe this to be partially true; but let me ask the farmers of Iowa whether they think they would lose in the exchange? Which would you rather do, lose the market which would be created by our vast imports into Canada or meet Canada in competition in the things which you produce? I assert confidently that in the sharp struggle with Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri——

Mr. CUMMINS. Why does the Senator pause?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute. I pause that the words may sink into or, rather, revive the Senator's memory. Now, I continue to read from the Senator's speech:

> I assert confidently that in the sharp struggle with Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri you would never be able to discern the influence of Canada in corn, oats, barley, hay, cattle, horses, hogs, butter, and eggs.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the Senator from Mississippi now concluded all that he desires to read from the address?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a great deal of good material following that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am perfectly willing to read further.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not ask the Senator to read it, but I commend it to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The reason why I read that part of it was because it is peculiarly relevant to almost the last sentence uttered by the Senator from Iowa before I read it; because if he thought, as I understood him a moment ago to say, that the admission of Canadian agricultural products was so unfair to our farmers that he would be willing to do almost anything to prevent this bill passing——

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Mississippi observe any inconsistency between the statement he has read and anything I have said here at this time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi would not be discourteous enough to charge any Senator with inconsistency, because that is peculiarly the virtue of people of our calling—politicians. But the last line of his speech when governor, in which the Senator from Iowa asserts—and does not assert hesitatingly, but "confidently"—that in the struggle—and not merely an ordinary struggle, but in the "sharp struggle" between the farmers in these various American States, including his own—"the Iowa farmer would never be able to discern the influence" of Canada, whence was to come the importation of all the designated Canadian agricultural products, struck me in such a way that had I made that speech and the speech which the Senator from Iowa now makes, I would have been disposed to suspect that perhaps I had been guilty of some inconsistency.

Mr. CUMMINS. Ah, Mr. President, the wit of the Senator from Mississippi is charming and delightful, as it always is, but I hope now that he has read the sentence, or the few sentences, from an address of mine he will listen a moment further to the development of the subject and will not forsake the Chamber for the cool retreats of the smoking room.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator from Iowa has noticed that except when I am absolutely forced to do so I never desert the Chamber while he is speaking.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Mississippi does me altogether too much credit. I have not had the honor to speak in the presence of the Senator from Mississippi until yesterday, and then he was chiefly conspicuous by his absence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. I may have been in another seat than my own.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi if he desires to be further heard.

Mr. CUMMINS resumed.

In my opinion, Mr. President, 10 years ago or 7 years ago there was no fear to be apprehended from the free admission of agricultural products.

And mark you, I am not standing here contending now against the free admission of agricultural products from Canada. It is the Senator from Mississippi who is inconsistent, not the Senator from Iowa. I am simply asking that when you admit the products of Canada free in competition with the farmer you admit also some of the manufactures free from Canada; and the Senator from Mississippi insists that none of these manufactures shall enter the United States free from Canada unless they enter under a separate and independent measure, the passage of which is to be long deferred and very uncertain at any time.

I am not addressing the Senate at this time for the purpose of holding duties upon agricultural products. I am addressing it for the purpose of awakening, if I can, some little sense of justice in the souls of the people here, so that when this free competition comes it shall be accompanied by a free market in which to buy. Ten years ago or seven years ago there was no difference between the prices of the main agricultural products in Canada and the United States.

Seven years ago we were absolutely upon an export basis. Our surplus was so large in comparison with our consumption that we took the export price just as Canada does now. We have gradually, however, neared the point when the duties upon certain products do increase the price. Still I am not asking that they shall be retained. I am simply asking the plainest and the commonest justice, that when the farmer must enter into free and unlimited competition in respect to what he sells he shall have the same competition with regard to what he buys.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator from Iowa understands that in the last sentence he has expressed an opinion in which I heartily concur. The only difference between the Senator from Iowa and myself seems to me to be that while he thinks he can, in the Congress of the United States, ingraft upon an agreement with Canada a bargain which it requires two parties to make, something to which the other side has not agreed, I do not. But whenever the time shall come for the admission of manufactured products from Canada at a revenue rate, or free, a great many of them, I shall be found cooperating with the Senator from Iowa much more than people upon his own side of the Chamber.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is simply to—

> Keep the promise to the ear
> And break it to the hope.

We have made no agreement with Canada. There is no agreement with Canada, and the Senator from Mississippi does not know what Canada will accept or what Canada will reject. It is for the Senate of the United States just now to make such proposition to Canada as it believes is for the welfare of its own people and in justice to a friendly neighbor to the north. We can not cloak ourselves with the delusion that there has been any agreement made with Canada or any arrangement made with that country. It is our business to make an agreement with Canada, if we desire that one shall be made. Neither the President of the United States nor the State Department has the power to make any proposal to Canada or receive any proposal from Canada which touches a change in the tariff duties ordained and established by Congress. Congress alone has the power or the authority under the Constitution to determine what our duties shall be against any country, and the House of Representatives alone has the power to originate such a measure.

Suppose that no Member had been found willing to introduce a bill into the House of Representatives touching this subject, does the Senator from Mississippi think that it could have been brought to the attention of Congress at all? Could it have been sent here in the form of a treaty to be ratified by the Senate with two-thirds majority in order to become the supreme law of the land?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In answer to that question I shall ask the Senator from Iowa another. Is he not aware of the fact that there have been negotiated half a dozen or more treaties between the United States and other countries which did affect import duties, beginning with the Jay treaty in George Washington's administration and the treaty with Prussia negotiated by Thomas Jefferson, and coming on down?

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, Mr. President, that there was a time when it was done, but since the far-famed and unfortunate enterprise with Canada in 1854 there has not been any treaty made with any country upon the face of the earth by which or through which it was attempted to change the tariff duties of the United States without the authority of Congress. I think there is one exception to the statement that I have made. It was a treaty entered into or projected between the United States and Mexico and possibly, as I remember it, negotiated by that distinguished leader, Ulysses S. Grant. But with that exception I know of no attempt on the part of the executive department of the United States to negotiate a treaty by which duties were changed without the previous authority of the Congress of the United States, including, of course, the House of Representatives.

I entirely deny the power of the President to negotiate a treaty touching a subject of which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By way of prefatory remark, I will say that, of course, this is not an attempt on the part of the President of the United States to effect this purpose by a treaty, but is in fact a presidential recommendation that Congress put into legislative shape a tentative agreement of the two countries. But going back to what we were talking about, the Senator from Iowa has said that since 1854 there has been no treaty made involving duties on imports——

Mr. CUMMINS. Save one that I now remember.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, we will leave the Mexican incident out—no treaty made which affects import duties since the Canadian reciprocity treaty of 1854.

Mr. CUMMINS. Which changed them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which changed them. I mean which involved them by changing them, raising or lowering them. Accepting that statement as a fact, is not this true, first, and is not this true, second: First, since that time the reason why no treaty of that sort had been entered into was because this Government had been under the domination of the high protectionists of the country, who did not want any treaties of that sort entered into; whose Executives have been protectionists, and therefore have not attempted to lower the tariff in any way? That is the first question. The second question is, Does the Senator not think that George Washington and Jay and Madison, the men who formed the administration, and the two Houses of Congress under George Washington's administration, many of whom had been concerned in the construction and formation of the Constitution itself, knew just about as much about the Constitution and what was intended by it as do we?

Mr. CUMMINS. Probably more; but I can only read the Constitution, and I try to understand the English language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator not think that the fact that the Jay treaty, which was negotiated in the lifetime of the men who framed the Constitution and under the Presidency of the man who was president of the Constitutional Convention, did affect import duties is rather persuasive authority?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Mississippi would have to produce the treaties; I do not deny that they are in existence; but, in order that we might conduct this argument with intelligence, he must produce those treaties in order that we may consider their terms. There is not a single one of them, as I remember, which concerns itself solely with import duties—not one. They all embrace matters which are and concededly were within the jurisdiction of the treaty-making authority.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That statement, to wit, that those treaties did not concern themselves solely with import duties, is correct; but if the President and the Senate have no right by treaty to enter into an agreement whereby import duties and nothing else are affected, where the sole effect of the treaty is to affect import duties, then, logically, certainly they have no right to enter into a treaty where a part of the treaty affects import duties. If they have authority to lower or raise by treaty a single duty they have equal constitutional warrant to raise or lower a thousand.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that this bill contains on this subject a plea of confession and avoidance. Section 3 expressly gives the President authority that he has never had before. If he had the authority, which is contended for, to negotiate such treaties, what is the necessity of putting it into this bill? If there is no objection, I will read section 3. That section provides:

That for the purpose of further readjusting the duties on importations into the United States of article or articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, and of the exportation into the Dominion of Canada of article or articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, the President of the United States is authorized and requested to negotiate trade agreements with the Dominion of Canada wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and the further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce.

If the President has this authority, then what is the necessity, I repeat, of putting it into this bill? Is it not, as I have said, a plea of confession and avoidance?

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand, Mr. President, that that is a question propounded to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who seems to be on the point of vanishing. I await with some impatience his return. [A pause.] Having now the attention of the Senator from Mississippi, I repeat that the inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota seemed to be propounded to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just at that point I received a note from the Marble Room, and was reading it, so I did not hear what the Senator from Minnesota said.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was quite sure the Senator from Mississippi would not last; that he would fail upon his inferential promise that he would remain until this discussion had been finished, at least upon the question of constitutional power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I assure the Senator from Iowa that I was very much worried by receiving a note asking me to step out to see a gentleman in the lobby for a minute. I so much regretted to miss the eloquence of the Senator from Minnesota and any additional eloquence of the Senator from Iowa that I had wished that the gentleman who sent for me had come at any other time; but while busy reading the note, I did not hear what the Senator from Minnesota said. It is my loss that I did not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there are coinçidences that are providential, and I accept this as one of them. I was about, however, to recur to the matter of consistency and to the conditions of 1894 as compared with the conditions of 1911. In the extract which the Senator from Mississippi was good enough to read from an address of mine, he will remember that I stated in it that reciprocity with Canada involved such concessions on the part of Canada, such a disposition upon the part of Canada, as would give to the United States a mastery of her market for the sale of manufactured products. Why, Mr. President, I not only advocated reciprocity in the address to which the Senator has referred, but I advocated it all over the United States. I spoke for it from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I believed in it, and I still believe in it; but I never dreamed that the friends of reciprocity would advance such a measure as we are now considering as the fulfillment of my hope that we might draw nearer to this neighbor of ours upon the north. I thought by admitting Canada upon fair terms to our market with her natural products, that Canada would admit us—that seemed to be her disposition then—to her market upon as good or better terms than she admitted any other nation for our manufactured products; but these seven years have revolutionized conditions. Canada does not admit us to her market for our manufactures upon better terms than she admits other nations. On the contrary, with few exceptions she does not, she has not in the past, and does not propose in the future to admit us upon as good terms as she admits other nations of the world. If we are to conquer that market we must do it against the unfair competition of her mother country, as well as against the unfair competition of France and Germany, with which nations she has recently entered into reciprocal treaties or agreements.

Mr. President, the bargain that possibly we could have made with Canada in 1898, in 1900, in 1902, and 1904 is no longer possible. Canada has entirely changed her ambition and her industrial form in these years. The national spirit has been so developed, the national ambition has been so stimulated that she intends to be not a subordinate of the United States, but a rival of the United States, not only in agricultural products, but in manufactured products as well. I do not decry the new spirit so manifest in Canada. I applaud the loyalty and the patriotism of the people of that country in changing the course which seemed to be popular in the years that have gone.

I may say here that no friend of this treaty discovers a greater necessity for friendly relations with Canada than do I. I believe that it ought to be one of the high and persistent purposes of the United States to cultivate friendly feelings with its neighbor upon the north, that lives and will live under practically the same conditions that surround us; but we might as well accept the conclusion that Canada, with her tremendous possibilities, is to be a rival of the United States, and I hope that the rivalry will go forward with all the friendly and gracious feeling that ought to animate the people who are so joined together in tradition and proximity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that Canada had been disposed to discriminate against the United States in trade relations in favor of the mother country?

Mr. CUMMINS. She has discriminated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As I recall the statistics of trade, Canada has during the recent past purchased from the United States more than twice the amount the United States has purchased from Canada. Does the Senator from Iowa think that is showing a disposition not to patronize the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska, Mr. President, can not possibly confuse the volume of trade with the fact of discrimination. The Senator from Nebraska knows that at the present time upon everything, or substantially everything, Canada admits imports from Great Britain at a less rate of duty than she admits the same imports from the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Possibly, but the fact is——

Mr. CUMMINS. Not possibly, but in fact. Now, if the United States has been able, notwithstanding that discrimination, to sell to the people of Canada more than Great Britain can sell her, so much to the credit, honor, and enterprise of the producers of the United States, but it does not alter the fact of discrimination.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is true not only that Canada every year purchases from the United States twice as much as she purchases from Great Britain, but it is also true in a reciprocal sense that Canada purchases twice as much from the United States as the United States purchases from Canada. It seems to me that those two facts indicate that the Canadian policy at least is not such as to prohibit friendly trade relations with the United States, but she appears to us as one of our very best patrons.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably, Mr. President. I began this speech by saying that we had pursued a policy toward Canada for 50 or 60 years that is utterly indefensible. We have been levying against Canada duties which, on the average and reduced to ad valorems, are the equivalent of 43 or 44 per cent, while Canada during all that time has been levying against our imports into her Dominion duties which were on the average little more than 25 per cent. No man, in view of the circumstances which surround both countries, would be so bold as to defend that course toward Canada. Our duties upon her imports have been so high that she could not supply us with any great volume of commodities; but the fact remains that Canada is discriminating against the United States, and if she did not discriminate against the United States we would take practically all of her market.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, with all due respect, I think both Senators are astray on this subject of Canadian exports and imports. For the fiscal year 1910 our exports to Canada were nearly $215,000,000, and our imports from Canada were only $95,000,000, giving us a balance of trade in our favor of $120,000,000, and the balance of trade has been in that proportion for the last 8 or 10 years. Last year our total exports were $1,744,000,000. Of this great amount Great Britain absorbed $505,000,000; Germany, $249,000,000; and Canada, $215,000,000. The balance of trade in our favor on the trade with Great Britain was $234,000,000; with Canada, $120,000,000; and with Germany only $80,000,000, showing how immense our trade with Canada is and how our exports to Canada are more than double our imports.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President, that is exactly what was stated both by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and myself. I have before me a consular report issued by the Bureau of Manufactures, and I find in it these statements:

The imports into Canada from the United Kingdom for 1910 were $107,679,719; from other British territory, $19,824,795; from the United States, $270,644,736; from France, $11,376,879; from Germany, $8,782,174; and from other countries $25,496,565, making an aggregate of $443,000,804.68, of which we exported into Canada $270,644,736, and in the same period imported from Canada into the United States $117,145,555.

These results have been accomplished notwithstanding the fact that Canada does give to Great Britain a lower duty upon substantially everything than she gives to the United States; and this bill does not change that, save that it disturbs the relation somewhat. We may get into Canada upon slightly better duties as compared with the duty upon British commodities than we have enjoyed heretofore.

But I care little about the chance of increasing our exports, and you care nothing about it. The Senator from Mississippi cares nothing about it. There is not a Senator here who has his mind fixed upon that phase of this arrangement—not one. It is a negligible quantity, and everybody knows it is a negligible quantity. Our minds are absorbed with just one thought, namely, the relinquishment of our duties upon our imports and the subjection of our farmers to the free competition of Canada. That is the phase of this question which engages our attention. I have not heard a word said heretofore, and do not expect to hear very much said, about the reduction of these duties accomplishing any very great enlargement of our exports into Canada. We are already in possession of her market in manufactured products to a high degree; and if we want to entertain that friendly relation which has been so vaunted here, if we want to draw close to Canada, if we want to add something more to her prosperity, we ought to hope that she will manufacture her own goods under the new departure instead of taking them from the United States.

Let us be consistent with regard to the matter. But referring again to the changed conditions, comparing 10 years ago with the present time, the man is blind who does not see that we can not deal with Canada upon the same terms that we could have dealt with her then. I want her friendship, and I may as well say here, because I understand I have been quoted in that Dominion as being in favor of annexing Canada to the United States, that I am not in favor of annexing Canada to the United States. I am not in favor of annexing Mexico to the United States, or Cuba to the United States, or Porto Rico or the Philippines. Our country is big enough to consume all the energies of the American people in its government. I do not want to add to the severity of our problems by the absorption of other countries, with their different interests and their different ambitions.

I want to put it now, once for all, so that everybody can understand my position at least with regard to it, that I am opposed to any enlargement of the territory of the United States, and I have no doubt the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] could find in some former address of mine, uttered in the spirit of national pride, a hope that the Stars and Stripes might some time float from the North Pole, with not a single sovereignty between its starry folds and the territory of the Republic. But I do not think so now. I am quite convinced that we have here and with us and among us and about us all the problems that are necessary to tax the best minds and the best hearts of the best people upon the face of the earth. And we will do well if we maintain the freedom and the glory and the dignity of the United States without inviting complicating situations in other directions.

Our concern here is, as it seems to me, the admission of a part of the products of Canada free without admitting at the same time another part of the products of Canada free. The Senators upon the other side can only say that we refuse to add these things to the proposition because they will endanger its passage and its approval. Let me remove, if I can, that cloud of fear and apprehension from their minds. Do you think it will render this agreement less satisfactory to Canada if we give her free admission to our country of her manufactured products, especially the manufactured products of agriculture? Do you think she will decline the agreement because her markets in the United States are widened without any additional burden being put upon her? No man will so assert. Do you believe—I hesitate to speak of this, but it has been mentioned so often that I feel impelled to do it—that the President of the United States would decline to approve this arrangement if we reduced the duties upon or removed the duties from other products coming from Canada into the United States without imposing any new burden upon Canada? Can you imagine any reason that could influence an intelligent mind to take that course?

If you can not, then you are barren of reasons for not admitting these additional articles to the free list. If the chief purpose of this arrangement is to enlarge our markets in Canada, then I can understand that somebody might say that we must not add these things to the free list, but must hold them for future bargain and sale. But that is not our purpose. It is not the purpose of a man in this Chamber. The purpose is to reduce our own duties so as to relieve our own people of some of the taxation which they have sustained, and I can not understand how those who believe in the reduction of duties can successfully go to the people of the United States and declare to them that they willingly missed the only opportunity that they will have at this session of Congress to render this tardy justice.

I put it upon another ground. While I do not believe that at the present time we can admit the agricultural products of Canada free into the United States without harm or injury to the American farmer, as was the case in 1904, yet if we are to do it—and I know we are going to do it—any hope of ameliorating or changing the bill in that respect has long since gone; if we are going to do it, give me some reason why we should not do something for the farmer at the same time that we are taking away the measure of protection which he now has.

As a broad and original proposition, in view of the changed conditions in this country, in view of the revolution in Canada, if I had my way about it I would not enter into any arrangement at all with Canada. I do not believe it is wise to enter into any arrangement with Canada. We can do her full justice without any agreement upon her part. If I could have my way about it, I would take this tariff from the beginning to the end, and I would put upon every competitive article just that duty which would measure the difference between the cost of producing it here and elsewhere. I understand perfectly that the application of that doctrine would affect a large part of the duties now imposed upon agricultural products. It would preserve some of the duties to some degree. And so long as we maintain the doctrine of protection, so long the farmers are entitled to the application of the rule without discrimination.

I have heard it said, too, that I was inconsistent, and I remember, as the Senator from Mississippi so beautifully said, consistency is thought to be a jewel. I do not think it is. It is not comparable with an honest faith, an honest conviction.

Allow me to suggest that one very distinguished authority—I will not name him, because the Senator from Mississippi will remember him and he will be able to correct this quotation, because I am conscious that I may not give it with accuracy. But he said something like this: That consistency is the hobgoblin of small men and mean minds.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a small matter, but I should dislike to have it go to the country that I said "consistency is a jewel," although, I believe, Shakespeare did say it. I said "it was the virtue of men of our calling, politicians," and so far as I know no other sensible class of men anywhere else in the world regard consistency as above being right. My own opinion is that a man ought to change his utterance whenever he changes his opinion, and he ought to change his opinions whenever he finds good reason to change them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe so. I believe the Senator from Mississippi has stated the truth of the matter with his usual felicity. I wish I could change mine oftener than I do. There is a pride of opinion that sometimes holds a man fast, long after the basis of his belief has disappeared.

I am not conscious, however, of any change in my opinion concerning this subject. I do not perceive any difference between the justice I asked in 1904 and the justice I ask now. I would make the protective doctrine an easy master instead of a hard master, as it is now. I would take up the schedules one at a time, and I am perfectly willing to take up the agricultural schedule first, and I believe the farmers of the United States are willing that their schedule shall be taken up first. And if in applying the Republican doctrine there is found no difference between the cost of production elsewhere and here, then I know they would cheerfully submit to the removal of the duties which affect their products.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa one question. He has a moment ago announced his adherence to the latest Republican doctrine of protection, to wit, that the rates ought to be "equal to the difference between the cost of production" here and abroad. I understand that that is not only the announcement of the Senator from Iowa, but was the announcement of the last Republican convention.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Iowa if there is any difference between that sort of a tariff and a prohibitive tariff?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, not for a question, but for an interruption—it seems to me there is none, and I will explain why, and I will not take long. In the old days—or not very old days, either, but in the former days—the Republican orators and writers announced that it wanted a tariff equal to the difference between wages abroad and wages in America, wages being but one factor in the cost of production, their claim being that protectionism was advocated and maintained "for the protection of American labor."

In that I did not see a tariff which was prohibitive. But if in fixing your tariff rates you are to include all the factors in the cost of production, then you arrive at this result: If you fix a rate so high that it meets the entire difference in the cost of production, no matter what makes the cost of production, difference of latitude, or training, or in fertility of land, or whatnot, then you fix a rate at which the cost of the article as manufactured in the United States is at least equal to, or a little bit above—because you would give yourself the margin of course in fixing it—what the article can be turned out for in the foreign field or factory, and then if the foreigner, in order to sell in the American market and make a profit in competition with the American who is producing the same goods, whether in farm or factory—if he is to sell in our market at all, he must sell without a profit at a price equal to what he can produce at plus the tariff and plus the transportation in competition with our producer who can sell at cost of production plus a profit and still sell cheaper.

If that sort of doctrine were applied between two people who were working in the same village it would not be prohibitive. It would put them upon an equality. But if you make a difference in rate equal to the entire difference in the cost of production, then you leave the foreigner handicapped by the ocean freight and whatsoever else may constitute the cost of transportation; so that it is impossible for the foreign producer to sell in the American market at all, and thus you have created for him a prohibitive tariff. There is but one thing I can see which recommends it. If the American behind the tariff wall attempt to effect a combination or a trust and make a very unreasonable rate, away and above the cost of production plus the tariff, plus the cost of transportation, and plus a reasonable profit, then the foreigner could come in at a slight profit above the cost of production plus the cost of transportation, plus the tariff. Even then the trust might reduce for the time being, until it had discouraged him and other men like him, and then go on with the game which it is now playing under the aegis of legislation at the cost of the American consumer.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, to one holding the view that I do of the doctrine of protection, and to one interpreting our platform as I interpret it, the question or statement of the Senator from Mississippi is easy of answer. If the cost of production is to be considered at the point of production, the consequence suggested by him would follow. I do not so understand the doctrine of protection, and I have never attempted to so apply it. To paraphrase it a trifle, I understand the doctrine of protection to be that measure of duties——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment, now. I understand the doctrine of protection to be that measure of duties that will enable the home producer to enter the markets of his own country and sell his products there at a fair profit in competition with his foreign rival. I do not believe that the doctrine can be measured by estimating the cost of production at the point of production. What is our purpose? Our purpose is to enable the producers of this country to get into their own markets and to occupy them at a fair profit, and if they increase their prices above a fair profit then to admit at once the foreign competitor. That is the purpose of the protective doctrine, and that is the meaning, as I understand it, of the phrase "cost of production."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the meaning of the Republican platform were as explained by the Senator from Iowa, then the man who worded it used very awkward English, because the wording is "the cost of production," not "the cost of marketing." If the platform had meant that the rates were to equalize the difference between the cost of production in America and the cost of production plus transportation abroad, then a man ordinarily cunning in the use of English would have said "the cost of marketing the foreign product in America." But that was not said.

One more thing and then I shall not interrupt the continuity of the remarks of the Senator from Iowa any further.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to have the Senator from Mississippi interrupt me, because I am not delivering a prepared speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I forgot something when I asked the Senator the question. Not only does the Republican platform say that the rate must be high enough to be equal to "the difference between" the foreign "cost of production" and the home cost of production, but it says the home "cost of production plus a reasonable profit," which makes it somewhat more prohibitive still, if you can say that a thing which is already prohibitive could be more prohibitive.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Mississippi knows that there have been at times some differences of opinion between the speaker and certain interpreters of the Republican doctrine of protection. I do not want to bind them, I do not attempt to bind them, but I know what binds me. In every case what I want to do in attaching duties to the products of American enterprise is to put such duties upon them as will enable the American people to raise them, produce them, take them to the market, and sell them to the American people at a fair profit. My purpose is always to accomplish that end.

Any duty that rises higher than is necessary to protect the American producer is one which I condemn as utterly and as wholly as the Senator from Mississippi. Any duty which does less than that, assuming now that the enterprise is one which is entitled to any protection at all, is utterly inefficient and could not be in compliance with or fulfillment of any doctrine of that character.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator from Iowa one more question. I am afraid I am doing like a great many people who say "in conclusion" seven or eight times before they conclude.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Mississippi can not have too many appearances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Iowa think that if over 100 per cent were necessary as a rate of duty in order to equalize the cost of foreign and of domestic production that that duty ought to be levied?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I answer that from two points of view. I can conceive of an article that could not be produced in this country in competition with some other country without a duty of 100 per cent, but if I found an article that required a duty of 100 per cent in order to perpetuate its production in this country, it would be conclusive evidence to me that we ought to abandon the production of that article.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I had answered my own question, I could not have answered it more to my own satisfaction.

Mr. CUMMINS. "Praise from Sir Hubert is praise indeed."

Mr. WILLIAMS. On the woolen manufactures of this country the duties are over 100 per cent in very many cases——

Mr. CUMMINS. It is my opinion——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And on various other articles. For six years at every Congress, at the other end of this Capitol, the floor leader of the minority there introduced a bill to reduce all duties over 100 per cent down to 100 per cent except where there were countervailing internal-revenue duties, when, of course, the import duty must be equal to the internal-revenue duty, and he could never get consideration of it in a Republican Committee on Ways and Means and could never get a corporal's guard of Republicans in this entire country to express themselves as willing to see such a law passed.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Mississippi would join with me——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree absolutely with the Senator from Iowa in the answer that he made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Mississippi agree with me also that we ought to put upon all articles the measure of protection to which I have referred, and will he join with me in an effort to so adjust the tariff duties of the United States that they shall measure that difference in cost as I have interpreted it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, while the gentlemen of the school of thinking to which the Senator from Mississippi belongs are out of power, we would gladly, or he at any rate would gladly, vote for any bill which would put a reasonable tariff rate upon articles rather than the present extortionate rate; for almost any revision downward. But if the school of economical thought to which the Senator from Mississippi belongs ever gets in power, the Senator from Mississippi will try, to the best of his ability, to regulate taxation in accordance with the needs of the Government and not in accordance with the needs of private enterprise, and he will try his best to divorce big business from government and government from it. He will try his best to have the Government of the United States walk in a pathway which will convince the world that it is a government and not a silent partner in a firm of hothousers of private business. He will try to have taxation so levied that the Government may have abundant revenue to do everything which it ought to do constitutionally and yet at the same time not to prostitute the taxing power for the purpose of putting dollars by legislation into the pocket of any man, no matter how great and no matter how humble, whether he be a farmer or a manufacturer or a miner.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to ask the Senator from Iowa whether I understood him correctly as saying that if there is any business in the United States which requires a protective duty of more than 100 per cent he would be in favor of abolishing that business?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not conceive, Mr. President, of any business in the United States that will honestly require a duty of more than 100 per cent. It is beyond the power of my imagination.

Mr. SMOOT. I could state a number of articles made in the United States where I think the Senator himself would concede that it would be impossible to manufacture them in this country at that rate. Let me take the lithographic view cards, the making of which has become a great business in this country; 100 per cent will not make the difference between cost of production in this country and Germany; 200 per cent will not make the difference; 300 per cent will not make the difference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I think we had better take them from abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. I am just asking the Senator the question as I should like to know the Senator's position in a case of this kind. It was proven before the Finance Committee not once but many times, by invoices, by the cost of production abroad, and by every means that it was in the power of the committee to obtain. I believe when the rate was increased two or three hundred per cent in the last tariff bill Senators did not object to it after it had been explained to them. It was a business proposition. I wanted to know whether the Senator really felt that a business of this kind ought to be abolished in this country and the articles purchased from abroad.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I am as insistent in giving to the real industries of the United States the full measure of protection, which I have attempted to describe, as any man in this Chamber, but when it is proposed to take a business that requires 300 per cent duty, and, therefore, which will advance the price 300 per cent or more, and stimulate it either into existence or into growth through the medium of a tariff duty, I rebel.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask——

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa this question: If the theory of the Senator from Utah were followed out to its logical conclusion, would it not lead us necessarily to a duty, say, of 1,000 per cent in order that the United States might produce their own bananas—under glass, probably—but they could be produced. Like Tom Carlyle, "I thank God that mankind are not logical," and I hope I can thank God that the Senator from Utah is not logical. If, however, his theory were carried out to its logical result, would it not lead to an absurdity just like that?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is impossible to tell to what length that theory might lead us. I do not believe the Senator from Utah, who is a stanch protectionist, wants to subject the doctrine of protection, which is a wise policy for our country, to any such criticism as his instance or his example certainly will create.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly not, Mr. President. I called attention to this one particular case to find out the position of the Senator from Iowa; but the comparison of the Senator from Mississippi between the growing of bananas and the manufacture of lithographic view cards in this country is so absurd that it is not worthy of consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator mean to say that the manufacturing of postal cards is so superior in its nature, is a pursuit so much better for mankind that this little manufacturing process of making picture cards is so much worthier of consideration than the agricultural industry of raising bananas that to compare one with the other as an extension of the logic involved is absurd?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If we are to pay 300 per cent in order that somebody may not have to go out of the business of manufacturing postal view cards, in the name of God why logically should we not pay a thousand per cent in order that children may eat "American bananas," patriotically waving the flag of the United States while they consume them, at a dollar apiece?

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield first to the Senator from Utah and then to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SMOOT. The difference between the item mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi and the item mentioned by me is that in the case of the duty upon postal cards the retail purchasers here pay no more for them, but the Senator is speaking of the consumer paying a dollar apiece for bananas, which is an entirely different proposition and there can be no comparison.

I agree with the Senator from Iowa as to the beneficent results of protection, but I believe also that if the actual cost of producing goods in this country and the actual cost of producing goods in a foreign country was the duty levied upon them and no more, our markets would be taken away from the American manufacturer by foreign manufacturers. There is no bigger curse to our protective system than undervaluation of goods entering the ports of this country. We base our duty upon the foreign valuation of producing goods and they are admitted into this country sometimes at less than half the value, which cuts the duty in two.

Again, Mr. President, there are countries that have antidumping laws. Canada, for instance, has one. An American manufacturer, overloaded with goods, rather than stop his mill may look for a foreign country to sell them in, sometimes at cost. If he desires to sell in Canada, he is met with an antidumping law. No goods can be sent into Canada and sold cheaper than they are sold in the country where they are manufactured. I have seen in this country, time and again, business concerns absolutely ruined by the great Chemical Trust of Germany shipping goods into this country below cost, until the manufacturing concerns of this country were closed up. Then the prices were immediately advanced and the American people were made to pay for all that the great trust in Germany had lost in reduced prices sold at in order to close up the American institutions. If the difference was only measured between the actual cost of production in this country and a foreign land, I say that that same thing would happen to a great many industries of this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rose to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to a statement he made which I think he had not fully considered. I am interested in the Senator's discussion, and I have tried to follow him as closely as possible when I could be in the Senate Chamber.

A moment ago the Senator from Iowa said that an article manufactured in this country which required 200 or 300 per cent protection was indefensible, and that he never would consent to a duty of that kind, which would raise the price of the article 200 or 300 per cent to the American consumer.

The Senator doubtless has given some attention to the fact that as long as Germany had a monopoly of the post card business Germany could charge the United States just what she pleased, and she did that very thing, while since the duty was put on post cards at a point where the American manufacturer could compete the post cards are being made in this country and are selling, I understand, at just about the price the American purchaser paid before that duty was placed upon that particular manufacture.

It is the old story, that if you give an individual a monopoly, he can charge what he pleases. If you give a nation a monopoly, that nation can charge just what it pleases. We come back to the oft-repeated and very wholesome illustration furnished by the fact that at one time we paid Great Britain $170 a ton for steel rails when we were not making any in this country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have heard the illustration with respect to steel rails many times before, but it never impressed me, because I am aware, and I know the Senator from New Hampshire is aware, that it has not been the duties levied by the United States upon steel rails that have reduced the price of steel rails from $170 a ton to $28 a ton. There have been so many other factors in the development of the business and the resulting decrease in the price of this commodity that, in my opinion, the duties levied by this country are negligible causes in that reduction.

Mr. GALLINGER. And yet, if the Senator will permit me, Mr. President, he must admit, because it is an historical fact, that as soon as we did impose a rate of duty which we thought was adequate and which proved to be adequate upon foreign steel rails, immediately the price in this country did decrease, and very largely decreased. Will not the Senator admit that if England to-day had a monopoly of the manufacture of steel rails, as Germany practically had of the post view cards, England would charge us a higher rate for steel rails than we are paying now, manufacturing them in our own country, or importing them, if you please, from foreign countries?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing to agree that any monopoly will charge all that the traffic will bear in this country or any other, and that is the reason why I have been so insistent against a rate of duty that will lead or could lead to a profitable monopoly.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to drift myself or allow this discussion to be drifted into the merits or demerits of the tariff generally. I bring it back again to the point from which I started. Entirely aside from the merits of protection, you are about to put the farmer of this country into free competition with his only competitor, with his only rival, and you at the same time refuse to give him a freer market with respect to the things that he must buy. I say, and it is a reiteration, that that is an offense against justice and against morals that the American people will neither forgive nor condone.

I have no doubt that there will be much discontent. I have no doubt there will be great injury wrought to the farmers of this country with respect to many of their products by the removal of these duties. Every man must know that, no matter what was true 10 years ago, it is true now that the American farmer is receiving some benefit, direct benefit, from his tariff duties, and if you take that benefit away from him he will recognize and resent the injustice. It is not the money that he loses or will lose that will be the chief cause of his resentment. Carlyle said years and years ago that it was not what a man had that makes the happiness or the misery of him; it is not the privations that he must endure, not the hardships that he must suffer, not the poverty through which he must pass; it is injustice that constitutes the insupportable burden, and against which free men always have fought and always will fight.

When this bill passes in its present form the loudest cry will not be because the farmers of North Dakota are unable to sell their wheat at as high a price as they might have otherwise sold it. It will not be because their fortunes may be impaired to some degree. It will be because the Government of their country solemnly, after long deliberation, determined that they were not entitled to the same consideration at its hands as are the manufacturers and other producers of the country. This will be the condemnation of this measure, against which no man can stand.

I wonder, as I have been wondering from the beginning, how it can be contemplated that this indignity shall be put upon the farmer when, at the same time, you add riches to the packer, riches to the miller, riches to the United States Steel Corporation, riches to every manufacturer of the products contained or mentioned in this arrangement.

There will come, Senators, a day of reckoning, not because you are merely despoiling the beneficiaries of the protective tariff—I mean the farmers now—of some of their advantages, but because you refuse to listen to their demand for justice. Do not for a moment think that those who, no matter how high their motives may be, no matter how sincerely they may think this is a step in the right direction, do not for a moment think that the people will fail to fasten the responsibility upon the men who inflict the wrong. It is no light or trivial issue that you are presenting to the people of the Nation.

Ah! I heard it said here just the other day from a very distinguished and eloquent Senator that although the farmer was about to be deprived of the direct benefit or advantage which he might in future years enjoy from the protective tariff, yet he would still be surrounded by the incidental advantages of the protective tariff given to manufacturers.

Do not be deceived by that illusion. When you put the farmer of this country into free competition with his rival in Canada it will make no difference to him whether this country or Canada grows in manufactures. The farmer of North Dakota will care little about the development of Minneapolis, because it will be just as beneficial to him if a bushel of Canadian wheat is consumed in Canada as it will if it were consumed in the United States. This measure means that we have undertaken to care for and dispose of the entire agricultural products of both Nations. It will matter little to the farmer of this country whether a new enterprise shall arise within our borders or whether it shall arise in Canada. We shall be just as much interested in having Canada grow so that it will consume its surplus of agricultural products as we shall be in having our own enterprises so grow that we will consume our surplus. Our problem will be to consume somehow or other the entire product of both the United States and Canada. When our Republican friends shall go in the future to the farmers of this country and say to them, "Although we have taken away from you the direct advantages which you might have hoped that you would enjoy under the tariff, nevertheless you are interested in the development of our industries, in enlarging our markets, in the growth of our cities, in the addition of new enterprises," the farmer will say, "I would just as soon have an additional enterprise in Canada that will help to consume the surplus there, which otherwise we must take, and therefore there is no compensation to me in the incidental growth or development of our own country."

From every point of view the measure proposed is repugnant to one's sense of right. I have yet to hear a single reply to that statement, save that it is a step in the right direction. I said yesterday, and I now repeat, it is a step in the wrong direction, because it will not accomplish, either from the standpoint of the Senators upon the other side of this Chamber or from the standpoint of Senators upon this side of the Chamber, the objects which they seek to accomplish.

Mr. President, I now intend to take up for a few moments some features of this bill which have not yet been the subject of discussion. I want your attention; and if I can not show you that it is immature and imperfect, even if you are looking at it in the hope of accomplishing that which the executive department or the State Department wants to accomplish, then I despair of the force of reason.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa proceeds with the discussion of the other branch of the subject I should like to have his opinion expressed to the Senate upon another feature of what he has been discussing. If I understand the attitude of the Senator correctly, it is that there is nothing in the nature of true reciprocity in this bill; that there is no opportunity for us to expand our agricultural exportations into Canada; and, therefore, the only thing which is reciprocal or attempted to be reciprocal is an exchange of agricultural products for agricultural products, where, in fact, the exchange is all on one side—coming from Canada into the United States. If I understand the Senator correctly, his idea is that the bill ought to be so framed that we can at least receive in return for the agricultural importations some manufactured exportations into Canada, so as to make it reciprocal in noncompetitive articles. It is right at this point that I want the attention of the Senator.

Even with the tariff wall between the United States and Canada our manufacturers have been able to leap over that wall with their products, and out of $376,000,000 importations we have been able to send them $223,000,000. Reducing that to percentages, it is about 61 per cent of all of Canada's imports. Canada must continue to import a great quantity of articles which we do not and can not produce. That would probably make up 30 per cent of her imports. Therefore we could not hope to secure more, with the increase of her population and the natural increase of our exportations, than about 70 per cent, if we secured all of the exportations into that country to which we would be entitled.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that is the case, if we are, without the reduction of a cent of the import duties of Canada, able to import nearly all of the manufactured articles which Canada produces, then, if you will lower the duties, who is to get the benefit other than the difference that will be pocketed by the manufacturers themselves in the reduction of the duties that they have got to pay? In other words, their business will be made more profitable to the extent of the duty that will be remitted to them; and at the same time there is nothing in this bill, if I understand it rightly, that will reduce the price of their products to the American consumer as a compensation to the farmer who is to suffer.

The particular point that I wanted the Senator's always lucid explanation of is as to how we are to be benefited, how even the manufacturers are to be benefited, by an increase in their exportations by the little lowering of duty that is allowed in the Canadian tariff?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I had it in mind to deal more fully with the phase of the subject just suggested by the Senator from North Dakota when I came to analyze what this agreement really is. It has not been analyzed as yet, and we do not know the meagerness of the concessions granted by Canada to the United States. They have not even been stated so that we could comprehend how little we are to receive. But I have no hesitation in answering in a general way the inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota.

Years ago the advocates of reciprocity understood that if they were to give to Canada a better market, a fuller market, for her agricultural products, her natural products—for it was not in the old days confined to agricultural products, but it was extended to all of her so-called natural products—if we would give Canada an admission to our markets for the things that Canada wanted then, and has always wanted, and which is the only thing that Canada wants of the United States, for Canada cares nothing about the slight reduction of our duties upon manufactured products, because she can not compete in our own country with our manufacturers. All that she cares for is the admission of her agricultural products, and in a day in which our surplus was large and in which with respect to the great staples of wheat, of oats, of barley, and the like, our prices were the export prices, because we had so large a surplus, I for one was willing to give Canada admission to our markets with her agricultural products if she would give us such admission to her markets for our manufactured products as would enable us to take possession of those markets and very greatly extend or widen our opportunities. But now we have gone on through these years gradually nearing the point where consumption and production of agricultural products in our country was to meet, and in the meantime, notwithstanding the discriminating duties of Canada against our manufactured products, we have taken practically all the markets that can possibly be yielded to us.

The reductions which, as I shall show later on, are given us in the reciprocal dutiable list as to manufactured products will not, so far as we can estimate, increase by a farthing our exports into Canada of those products. As the Senator from North Dakota suggests, the only result will be, if that result shall follow, to slightly reduce the prices at which the Canadian consumer can take those products from our producers. There is no reciprocity in this measure—none whatsoever—and the sooner we strip it of its mask the better it will be for us and for the people of the United States. It is a proposition for the reduction of duties; that is all. It is a proposal for the removal of duties; that is all; and, to a degree, I am in sympathy with that proposition. I would like to take the tariff and revise it, according to the Republican doctrine, from the beginning to the end; but if we can not do that, and we must remove our agricultural duties under the combination that seems to have been formed here to that end, then I insist that other duties shall be removed at the same time and in the same instrument.

But now I come back again to the statement I made a few moments ago, that I propose to show you that if you have any regard for the dignity of our country and the welfare of our people, if you have any respect for the American Nation in its dealings with foreign countries, you can not accept this arrangement in the form in which it was sent to Congress and in the form in which it passed the House of Representatives. I shall state the question as clearly and as concisely as possible, and I have committed this statement to writing so that there can be no misunderstanding of my meaning.

If the bill were to pass in its present form and if thereafter Canada should establish duties in exact conformity to the provisos beginning, respectively, on pages 8 and 19, and the President should make the proclamation that would put the prescribed duties and the free list in operation, and if then the next day, month, or year Canada should change her duties, as she would have a perfect right to do, the duties and the free list we have established for ourselves would continue in operation indefinitely—that is to say, until Congress, always slow and sometimes uncertain, should take up the matter and make such changes as might be thought wise.

What do Senators think of such a situation, and is there a Senator here who denies that construction of the bill before us? If this bill is passed and Canada passes her bill, and Canada the next day shall change her duties, no matter how, our law continues as it was and as it is proposed to be written until somehow, sometime, Congress shall change or amend that law.

If we are to accept the basis which is proposed to us by the executive department, if we are to assume that the concessions which we grant to Canada are the consideration for the concessions which Canada grants to us, if Canada withdraws those concessions ought not ours to cease, not by the slow and uncertain process of legislative enactment, but, ipso facto, because the consideration upon which it is based has been withdrawn? Is there a Senator here who is willing to become responsible for an enactment which, if it be not of the sort which I have described, is a mere pretense? If we intend to reduce the duties as to Canada, let us do it boldly and openly and fairly. I will join in the effort; but if we are trading with Canada, if we are giving her certain free admissions, and if we are reducing certain duties in consideration, and only because Canada is giving us certain free admissions and certain reductions in her duties, when Canada destroys the consideration, ought not our duties to resume their place in the general tariff law?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose Canada should do as the Senator has indicated, would we not then have free wood pulp, free print paper, and free lumber?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, sir; we would not. That is one of the objections I have to this bill. Under it we will not have free lumber or anything like free lumber; we will not have free wood pulp and free print paper, or anything like free wood pulp and free print paper.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would we not have lower duties than we have now?

Mr. CUMMINS. We would have slightly lower duties upon lumber and we would have a limited territory from which to get free wood pulp and free print paper; that is all. But I am now putting it upon another basis. The Senator from North Carolina is a man of great influence in his own party councils. Why does he not press, in connection with this, some proposition, a bill or an amendment, which will give us free lumber and will give us free paper and free pulp, no matter what conditions may be attached in Canada? I am simply trying to expose the dangers of the measure pressed upon us. We are asked to make a bargain, and yet we have not taken the common, ordinary precaution in the bill to say that if the other side takes away the consideration that our concessions shall also fail. Does not the Senator from North Carolina believe that that ought to be a part of the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. If Canada refuses to carry out her compact I think we could repeal it, but I think Canada will carry out her part.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to be understood as impeaching in any way the motive or even suggesting bad faith on the part of Canada. Nothing has occurred that leads me to suspect that she will not act in good faith, but, as reasonable and self-respecting persons, when we are making a contract, as this is apparently, ought we not to insert those provisions that are common in contracts? We are making, practically speaking, a legislative treaty; we are giving something to Canada in consideration of things that Canada gives to us; and yet we sit here apparently willing to leave to the uncertain future the consequences which will follow if Canada desires to withdraw; and Canada has expressly said, and our country has expressly said, that either is at perfect liberty to withdraw whenever it pleases. No notice is required; no preliminary negotiations are necessary.

I do not intend to pursue this suggestion longer. I have felt that when once it was fairly impressed upon the Senate there must be a disposition to correct it in that respect; and one of my amendments is for the purpose of correcting it in that respect, and making it take not only the form but the substance of a bargain.

I desire to suggest another peculiarity of this arrangement——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Bailey	Cummins	McLean	Smoot
Bourne	Curtis	Martin, Va.	Stone
Brandegee	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Sutherland
Briggs	du Pont	Nelson	Swanson
Bristow	Foster	Overman	Thornton
Brown	Gallinger	Page	Townsend
Bryan	Gore	Penrose	Watson
Burnham	Gronna	Perkins	Williams
Burton	Guggenheim	Poindexter	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Pomerene
Crane	Johnson, Me.	Rayner
Culberson	Lippitt	Shively

Mr. BRYAN. My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is detained by his duties in connection with the Lorimer investigation, and is therefore unavoidably absent from the Senate on this occasion.

Mr. THORNTON. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and is engaged in the hearing of the Lorimer case. He is therefore detained from the Senate at this time. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was called from the city last evening, but he is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who is also out of the city.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My colleague [Mr. JONES] is engaged in the Lorimer investigation, and is therefore unavoidably absent from the Senate.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is unavoidably detained because of his connection with the Lorimer investigating committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. A further extraordinary defect in the bill—and now I ask the attention of lawyers especially—is that the dutiable list and the free list are so completely separated by the language used that Canada is given the option to accept the one and reject the other. I have already referred to the proviso in connection with the dutiable list, and beg the Senate to notice that if we were to pass the bill, that then Canada could change her duties so as to conform to the duties mentioned on pages 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 without taking any action whatever with respect to the free list found on pages 16 to 23, inclusive, and nevertheless it would become the duty of the President to issue his proclamation upon the dutiable list, and thereafter our duties would be as the bill prescribes, and the free list could thus be wholly abandoned.

Do Senators get the full import of the statement I have just made? Under this bill we are extending to Canada the option to take either one or the other of these lists, or both, as she may desire. She can accept our reciprocal dutiable list and we will be bound. She can accept our free list without the dutiable list and we will be bound. I have never dreamed that when this weakness or defect in the measure was pointed out it would find a defender. I, of course, do not know whether it was the intention of our State Department to give to Canada an option of this character, but whatever may be or have been the intention upon either side, the proposition is so shockingly unfair that I take it for granted the Senate will not concur in any such jug-handled procedure, and that, therefore, it will be found necessary to amend the bill in this respect.

As the Senator from North Dakota said a few moments ago, the real thing that Canada wants of the United States is the free admission of agricultural products. She cares nothing about the other. If we have any advantage in the trade, it is in the other—in the reciprocal dutiable list. Now, suppose that Canada were to enact into law her part of the free list and not her part of the dutiable list. Do Senators think that the arrangement ought to go into effect unless it is assumed that the reciprocity here is article by article; that we have sufficient compensation for admitting free wheat into the United States in the admission of free wheat into Canada? Our compensation lies largely in the expansion of our trade in Canada in manufactured products, although I think there will be severe disappointment in that respect.

But do you not agree—and I am asking now and looking at the Senator from Missouri, because I know he is sincerely for this arrangement—would he be willing that Canada shall pass a law accepting the free list and rejecting the reciprocal dutiable list? If he would not, and I do not believe there is a Senator here, whether for or against the measure, who believes that it would be fair or just or right or in harmony with the spirit which led to these negotiations and which finally consummated them in the arrangement before us, who believes that Canada ought to have the option to take what is advantageous for her and deprive us of everything that is advantageous for us. Of course, we could then repeal our law. But surely Senators are not willing to remit the United States to that inadequate remedy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is merely for a question. The Senator's discussion of this phase of the bill is novel and rather startling to me. I will ask the Senator, and I presume the question is unnecessary after the exposition the Senator has made of it, whether it is his view that if we should to-morrow vote upon this bill and pass it as it came to us from the House of Representatives, and Canada should on the succeeding day vote in favor of either the reciprocal exchange so called of certain articles, leaving out the free list, or vote in favor of the free list leaving out the portion of the bill relating to the exchanges, the reduction of duties, it would then be a valid law, so far as we are concerned, and we would be bound by it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a very important matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably. I do not believe there is a lawyer in the Senate who, after having examined the matter, will assert that the result which I have stated will not follow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand the Senator to say that he had an amendment pending that would cure that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have. It is one of the amendments I have offered. Allow me to make it now perfectly clear, because in our hurried and busy life we do not always give our attention to every phase of a matter of this sort.

I take first the reciprocal dutiable list. It begins as follows:

> That there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles hereinafter enumerated, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, when imported therefrom into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), in lieu of the duties now levied, collected, and paid, the following duties, namely:

Now, if there was nothing more and we passed the law, these duties would at once become effective and no other duties could be levied at our customhouses. I turn, however, to the condition which limits the effect of the law:

> Provided, That the duties above enumerated shall take effect whenever the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that on the articles hereinafter enumerated, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), when imported therefrom into the Dominion of Canada, duties not in excess of the following are imposed, namely—

There is no association between that and any other part of this bill, and therefore whenever Canada shall impose duties not in excess of those which are mentioned in our list upon this series of articles, which are the same except in a few instances as are in our own lists, then our duties go into effect, no matter what Canada may do with regard to any other part of this bill.

And I turn likewise to the free list. It begins:

> That the articles mentioned in the following paragraphs, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, when imported therefrom into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), shall be exempt from duty, namely—

Likewise, the moment this law is passed this free list becomes effective were it not for what I am about to read, which is as follows. I now read from page 19:

> Provided, That the articles above enumerated, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, shall be exempt from duty when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that the following articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), are admitted into the Dominion of Canada free of duty, namely—

And then follows the same free list.

Undoubtedly we are extending to Canada in this bill the option to take either the reciprocal dutiable list or the reciprocal free list. I repeat the assertion that no lawyer will be found here to differ with me in that construction.

Now, I do not know what the intention of our Secretary of State may have been. It may have been a mere inadvertence or it may have been purposely so arranged. But I ask the Senate whether it is willing to make a proposition of that sort to the Dominion of Canada in which Canada can, without the least breach of good faith, take that list which constitutes our concessions to her and reject that list which constitutes her concessions to us, if there are any concessions to us? I do not believe we can maintain this impervious attitude of refusal to amend this arrangement in any respect whatsoever. If we adhere to it we abdicate the highest duties which the laws of the United States impose upon American citizens.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. The attention of the Senator has doubtless been directed to the different provisions in the Canadian bill. They group them there.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know they do.

Mr. HEYBURN. And put them all under one head.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Canadian bill does not give the United States any option whatsoever. We must take them all or none. I have a copy of it. I thank the Senator from Idaho for making the suggestion, because it emphasizes the point I am making and it emphasizes the consequences of this indifferent mood which prevails in the Congress respecting a matter of this sort. It emphasizes the danger of accepting whatsoever comes to us without any examination or inclination to amend it if it is seen to be defective or imperfect. I feel sure that Senators will not refuse to make the bill what it ought to be in the respects I have mentioned.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I will inquire of the Senator from Iowa if he feels that he will be able to conclude his speech to-day, or will he desire further time?

Mr. CUMMINS. The subject has grown upon me so while on my feet, and we have had so wide a discussion relating to matters that were not within my original view, but which have been brought forward, and very properly brought forward by interruptions, that I fear I can not finish to-day what I have to say.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator willing to yield now?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am glad to yield.

H. R. 8649. An act to authorize the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW. from Longfellow Street to Sixteenth Street, and of Kennedy Street NW. through lot No. 800, square No. 2718.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. FOSTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in view of the agreement which I note in the RECORD was made here a few days ago, I suppose nothing can be done, and therefore would ask that House joint resolution 39 with a Senate amendment lie upon the table temporarily.

INFORMATION FROM SECRETARY OF STATE CONCERNING CERTAIN STATEMENTS BY JOHN L. GRIFFITHS, CONSUL GENERAL, LONDON.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 188, H. Rept. 58), introduced by Mr. HAMILL, of New Jersey, requesting the Secretary of State to furnish the House of Representatives with information concerning certain statements made by John L. Griffiths, consul general at London, with amendments, and I ask that the resolution as amended do now pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York sends to the Clerk's desk a privileged resolution and a report thereon, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand from reading the RECORD, there was a very clear agreement at the last meeting of the House that nothing was to be done to-day, and I suggest that the gentleman withhold the report until we have a House here that can consider it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I think when the gentleman from Pennsylvania hears the resolution as amended read he will not object to it. It is a privileged resolution of inquiry calling on the Secretary of State for information, and there is no objection to it as amended.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I understand, is absent under the belief, and properly under the belief, that no business would be transacted to-day except to meet and adjourn, and then to meet again and adjourn over the 4th of July.

Mr. DALZELL. That is my understanding, and I shall object to any business being transacted.

Mr. BARTLETT. And, so far as I am concerned, I believe the agreement ought to be religiously kept.

Mr. SULZER. Under the circumstances, then, Mr. Speaker, I will report the resolution with amendments favorably, and it can be called up at some future time.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL SATURDAY.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet on Saturday, July 1, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 30, 1911.

LAWS OF PORTO RICO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 60):

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 26, 1911.

SIR: As required by section 19 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the Journal of the Executive Council of Porto Rico for the session beginning January 9 and ending March 9, 1911.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. TAFT.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill—House bill 4412.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

SEVERAL SENATORS (to Mr. BORAH). Withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think there is any option when the suggestion has been made.

Mr. PENROSE. It can be withdrawn.

Mr. BORAH. I withdraw it for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho withdraws the suggestion, and the Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in order that we may proceed properly and not establish a bad precedent—and I am not going to urge this, because it is immaterial with me whether it is acted on or not—I think the suggestion of the absence of a quorum can not be withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sees no reason why it can not be withdrawn. It seems to the Chair that any Senator, possibly immediately after suggesting the absence of a quorum, might discover that he did not wish to make the suggestion and withdraw it. The Senator might by observation conclude a quorum was present. The Chair had not ordered the roll to be called.

Mr. PENROSE. It can be renewed by any Senator, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely wish that we do not go off and make a mistake and establish a precedent now. I think it will be found upon an examination of the precedents that it is held the suggestion can not be withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Possibly the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], immediately after he made the suggestion, discovered by observation that there is a quorum present.

Mr. HEYBURN. During a former session of the Senate I was in the position that my colleague occupied this morning, and I was very promptly informed that it was not my privilege to withdraw it; that the suggestion having been made it could only be determined by a roll call. I think we should have a uniform practice in the matter. I was at that time the victim, if I may so speak, of the situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to submit some proposed amendments to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table until I call them to the attention of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table, as requested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, when we adjourned yesterday I was calling to the attention of Senators a grave objection, as I think, to the form of the bill under consideration. I shall not review what I said yesterday with regard to it, but the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] very kindly, and in order to emphasize, I think, the objection that I was making, referred to the form the author of the resolution in the Canadian Parliament seemed to think wise to express the idea; and I am so much impressed with the reference made by the senior Senator from Idaho that I intend this morning to read, so that it may appear in my remarks, precisely what is proposed in Canada in this regard. I hold in my hand a copy of the resolution offered in the Canadian Parliament, and its concluding paragraph is as follows:

That it is expedient to provide that the act proposed to be founded on the foregoing resolutions shall not come into operation until a date to be named by the governor in council in a proclamation to be published in the Canada Gazette, and that such proclamation may be issued whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council that the United States Congress has enacted or will forthwith enact such legislation as will grant to Canada the reciprocal advantages provided for in certain correspondence dated Washington, January 21, 1911, between the Hon. P. C. Knox, Secretary of State for the United States, and the Hon. W. S. Fielding, minister of finance of Canada, and the Hon. William Paterson, minister of customs of Canada.

It thus appears, Mr. President, that however much confidence Canada may have in the good faith of the United States the Dominion intends that her changed customs shall not go into effect until all the advantages which are promised by the arrangement with the United States shall become effective.

I now pass to another objection which, it seems to me, is well founded and which may be laid against the arrangement in the form in which it is now before us. In order that I may supply an omission in my own amendment respecting the point I am about to mention, I desire to perfect the amendment by inserting certain words that were inadvertently left out. I perfect the amendment by inserting in it the words that I have sent to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the Senator's privilege. The amendment has not been acted upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Senators, I have proposed the following amendment, as found in the series of amendments submitted to the Senate some days ago:

Provided further, That if at any time after the articles hereinbefore mentioned are admitted free under the aforesaid proclamation the President becomes satisfied that the rates of transportation upon any such article from Canada into the United States are unreasonably low or that the rates of transportation upon any such article from the United States into Canada are unreasonably high, as compared with fair and reasonable rates upon the like article for substantially the same distance in the United States, he may issue his proclamation to that effect, and thereafter the said article or articles, when imported from Canada into the United States, shall be subject to the general tariff law of the United States.

Mr. President, if we are not entirely lost to all reason, if we have a real desire to protect the people of our own country, then whatever may be the view of the majority of the Senate with respect to the wisdom of this arrangement, they certainly can not and will not subject the citizens of our country to the grave and imminent peril to which they will be subjected if the amendment that I have now proposed be not inserted in the bill.

I need not dwell upon the long struggle that has taken place in the United States to secure, through the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission, fair and reasonable relative rates, so that all our people can reach the markets of our country upon such charges as are relatively fair and reasonable. It has been one of the great problems which we have endeavored to solve. It has been one that has given both the legislative and administrative departments of the United States more perplexity and more concern than any other with which we have grappled. We have tried hard, both by legislation and by administration, to so adjust our rates of transportation that our producers in various parts of the country can reach their market upon just, relative rates.

Every Senator here knows that the development of the United States has been arbitrary, as decreed by the transportation companies. Every Senator knows that the railway companies and other transportation companies have determined what communities shall prosper and what communities shall languish, what cities shall grow and what cities shall decay, and we have done all we could, recognizing this evil in our transportation system, to give to every community in the United States a fair chance to reach our own markets. Every Senator knows that the prosperity of any community commercially depends upon fair rates as compared with its competitor or competitors. Every Senator knows that a discrimination of a very few cents per hundred pounds or per article will determine the channels of commerce in the United States and determine whether a particular community can profitably do business or not as against its rival or rivals.

We have no control over the rates of transportation from Canada into the United States. We have no control over rates of transportation from the United States into Canada; and if you pass this bill as it is now and the roads leading from Canada into the United States shall for purposes of their own, to accomplish objects which may be entirely reasonable to them, reduce the rates of transportation upon agricultural products into our market, and if it should happen that our transportation lines should refuse to reduce their rates accordingly, you will have given the producers of Canada a monopoly in the markets of the United States, and you will have driven your own people to the hard necessity of employing export rates alone in order to transfer or transport their products to distant shores. If there were nothing else objectionable in this bill, this omission to protect our people against a power over which we have no control ought to be sufficient to cause the rejection of the measure. What will you do if from the grain fields of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, or Alberta the railroads and water lines of Canada reduce the rate on wheat 3 cents a bushel or 5 cents a bushel, which they might do in order to build up their own country? Tell me in what attitude you will then be before the American people. Tell me, or describe if you can, the incalculable injury that you will have done to your own people, even if you desire to put them into free competition with the people of Canada.

I repeat, as I have repeated many times, that I am not projecting this argument against the free admission of agricultural products, although I believe the proposition to be totally unsound and unfair; but, assuming that you have made up your minds—as I think you have—to allow all these products to come into the American market, am I to be told and are the American people to be told that you will not give them the safeguard of requiring that the rates of transportation from the foreign country into our market shall be fair and reasonable as compared with our own rates?

You have no other power over these rates save the power of retaliation. If the Canadian transportation companies shall do the thing that I have suggested, and which I believe they will do, you have the power to say that then the general tariff laws of the United States shall attach to Canadian imports. It is the only power we can exercise, and if we fail to exercise it we shall be held faithless to the interests of our people.

I made this complaint to the authorities who prepared this agreement. I did not wait until the subject came for discussion before the Senate in order to express my concern with regard to this feature of the proposed legislation. I laid it before the men who have been instrumental in bringing before us this bill, and without, I think, betraying any confidence, I may be permitted to say that the answer was that at some time a treaty might be made with the Dominion of Canada that would organize a tribunal to review international rates, and that through that tribunal we might receive justice. Do you intend—I put it to you in all earnestness—to allow our people to encounter the peril I have mentioned? My amendment will not destroy the arrangement; it will not impair it. It is intended to do the scantest justice to our own country.

The transportation history of this country will show that the danger I have outlined is not an imaginary danger. These lines of transportation will pursue the course which, in their opinion, is most profitable to them and for the country that they are serving. If we are so blind as to refuse to amend the bill in this respect, I think the people who are denied this justice will demand it at the first opportunity that is given to them; and I hope they will demand it in every way and at every time possible under the laws of our country.

I now pass to a brief examination of the arrangement itself. It has never been analyzed in this Chamber, or, so far as I know, in any other. We are proceeding broadly and generally upon the hypothesis that in some way, in some fashion, it is to confer very great benefit upon the people of the United States, and also a benefit upon the people of Canada, and that between the two we shall be drawn into closer and better relations. I now propose to look briefly into it, for the purpose of discovering just exactly what we give and precisely what we receive. I use for this purpose not the bill before us, but the schedules attached to the correspondence between the two countries. The first schedule in the diplomatic exchange is Schedule A. It is a reciprocal free list. I shall not again recite the items found in the free list or in either list, but I ask, Mr. President, that the tabulation which I have here of these articles, and which I hold in my hand, may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. CUMMINS. The tabulation referred to is as follows:

RECIPROCAL FREE LIST—ARTICLES ON WHICH FREE TRADE IS TO BE ESTABLISHED.

The schedules attached to the correspondence which passed between the representatives of the two countries are four in number:

The first, being Schedule A, is a reciprocal free list; that is to say, it specifies the articles which are to be admitted free of duty when imported into the United States from Canada and when imported into Canada from the United States. I will not attempt to recite all the items, but will content myself with a reference to the principal commodities.

1. All live animals; and there are mentioned specifically cattle, horses, mules, swine, sheep, and lambs.
2. Poultry, alive or dead.
3. Wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, edible dried peas and beans, corn, flaxseed, linseed, cotton seed, grass seed, and all seeds (except flower seeds), hay, and straw.
4. All vegetables in their natural state.
5. All fresh and dried fruits, except lemons, oranges, limes, grapefruit, shaddocks, and pineapples, coming from Canada into the United States.
6. All dairy products, and eggs in the shell.
7. Honey and cottonseed oil.
8. Fish of all kinds, except when preserved in oil.
9. Fish oil.
10. Salt.
11. Timber, when squared otherwise than by sawing, and lumber when not further manufactured than sawed; posts, poles, staves, pickets, and palings.
12. Crude gypsum, unmanufactured mica, crude or ground feldspar, sulphate of soda, or salt cake, and soda ash.
13. Cream separators.
14. Rough brass in bars and rods; thin rolled iron or steel sheets; cast-steel wire, valued at not less than 6 cents per pound; galvanized iron or steel wire of certain gauges; type-casting and typesetting machines; barbed fencing wire; rolled wire rods, not over three-eighths of an inch in diameter and not smaller than No. 6 wire gauge.
15. Pulp of wood, however manufactured, and paper valued at not more than 4 cents per pound.

With regard, however, to wood pulp and paper it is provided that the free admission applies only to such wood pulp and paper as come into the United States without any export duty, license fee, or charge of any kind, or any prohibition or restriction upon the exportation; and it is further provided that wood pulp and paper shall not be admitted free of duty from the United States into Canada until they come into the United States from all parts of Canada free of duty.

The schedule with regard to wood pulp and paper was amended in the House of Representatives before the bill passed the House at the last session, and I may have occasion to explain the amendment later on.

EQUAL-DUTY LIST—ARTICLES BEARING SAME TARIFF WHEN ENTERING EITHER COUNTRY.

The second schedule is Schedule B, a reciprocal dutiable list; that is to say, articles to be admitted into each country from the other at the same rates of duty; it comprises:

1. Meats of all kinds, including lard and tallow.
2. Fish packed in oil.
3. Vegetables in cans or other air-tight packages.
4. Wheat flour, rye flour, buckwheat flour, oatmeal, rolled oats, and all cereal foods; corn meal, bran, middlings, etc.
5. Barley malt, biscuits, wafers, and cakes.
6. Maple sugar and sirup.
7. Agricultural implements; cutlery; the small sizes of plate glass; automobiles and motor vehicles, but not including rubber tires.

I have not mentioned all the articles in this schedule, but have referred to the principal ones.

NONRECIPROCAL DUTIES—ARTICLES EXPORTED OR IMPORTED ON WHICH SCHEDULES ARE FIXED.

The third schedule, being Schedule C, is a list which prescribed the rates of duty on certain articles when exported from Canada into the United States, but upon which the duties are not reciprocal. It contains:

1. Laths; shingles; sawed boards, planed or finished on one or more sides; iron ore, and coal slack.
2. Aluminum, in plates, sheets, bars, and rods.

EXPORTS TO CANADA.

The fourth schedule, being Schedule D, is a list of articles to be admitted into Canada, when exported from the United States, at certain rates of duty which are not reciprocal. This list comprises:

1. Cement.
2. Trees.
3. Condensed milk; unsweetened biscuits; fruits in air-tight cans or other air-tight packages.
4. Peanuts.
5. Bituminous coal.

In considering the purely commercial advantages or disadvantages of the proposal of which I have now given you the substance, it is obvious that we must view it from at least two standpoints.

First. The expansion of our exports into Canada induced by the additions to her free list of certain articles, and the reduction of her duties on certain other articles.

Second. The effect upon our domestic producers and consumers of adding to our free list certain commodities, and of reducing our duties upon other commodities."

Now listen. I hope I shall receive the attention of Senators for a moment, especially upon this statement.

I take these viewpoints in the order in which I have stated. The aggregate of the imports into Canada from all countries in 1910 was, in round numbers, $443,000,000, of which there came from the United States, in round numbers, $270,000,000. Canada bought of us, therefore, under existing tariff conditions, practically three-fifths of all her foreign purchases, and, excluding the element of increased consumption, it is apparent that whatever inroads we make we must make upon the remaining two-fifths of her imports.

WOULD CUT REVENUES HEAVILY.

Upon the articles in the proposed reciprocal free list which we exported into Canada for the year ending March 31, 1910, there were paid in duties $1,476,129.13. These articles were of the total value of $21,957,605; that is to say—now mark you, Canada levied an average equivalent of a 6.7 per cent ad valorem duty upon our exports of the articles embraced in the proposed free list, so that the concession, as a whole, on these things can not exceed the percentage I have named.

That is to say, upon the free list, concerning which so much has been said here, Canada concedes to us an average ad valorem duty of 6.7 per cent. The reason of the meagerness of the concession arises from the fact that a very large proportion of the articles contained in the free list is already free in Canada, and she concedes us nothing whatsoever with regard to the articles already free, nor can she; but we are getting a reduction upon this entire free list in Canada of 6.7 per cent, and no ingenuity can increase the extent of that concession.

Agricultural products—and I am now speaking of all the products of the soil—bear in Canada now substantially a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem, and we are receiving with respect to those products a reduction of 20 per cent upon the average, but not upon the entire list.

The lumber on the proposed free list, with one exception, is now free when exported from the United States into Canada. The one article of stave bolts is the only concession which Canada gives the United States with respect to lumber from her list as already established by law. We have a concession of 17½ per cent on crude glycerin, of which we exported last year $50,000 worth. We have salt made free, of which we exported last year $81,000 worth, in round numbers. Canada now has a duty of 5 per cent on tin plate and 20 per cent on type-casting and typesetting machines. We exported last year those articles to the value of $296,662.

I pass the paper schedule, because we get nothing whatsoever from Canada at the present time with regard to pulp wood or paper; and it is very doubtful, as we all agree, whether there ever will be or can be any concession from Canada to the United States with regard to pulp wood, paper, and the like.

The value of the imports into the United States from Canada of the articles covered by the proposed free list for the year ending June 30, 1910, was $39,811,560, and the average duty levied converted into ad valorem was 10⅜ per cent.

That is, our average duty now upon the articles which we propose to put upon the free list is 10⅜ per cent. Taking it in the aggregate, it is not more, and can not be construed to be more, than a fair revenue duty upon those articles.

The imports of agricultural products, including those of the orchard and garden, grouped as before, aggregated $7,981,336, upon which our duties were $1,662,310, or an average of a little less than 21 per cent.

We imported of timber and lumber of all kinds made free by the proposal of the value of $18,959,753, upon which our duties were $1,323,530, or a little in excess of 7 per cent.

We imported crude gypsum, unmanufactured and ground mica, feldspar, and crude asbestos of the value of $1,861,149, but asbestos is now free, and we imported of that commodity to the value of $1,087,098. The other articles are not of the first importance.

Turning to the reciprocal list I find that we imported articles from Canada during the year ending June 30, 1910, to the value of $5,901,923, upon which duties were levied of $968,309, or 16.4 per cent. We reduce these duties by the proposed arrangement upon an average of 6.4, leaving the equivalent of a duty upon them of 10 per cent ad valorem. This reduction may enlarge the imports of these things slightly, and it may reduce a little the price of laths, shingles, and planed boards and lumber.

SOME BENEFIT CONCEDED.

While it is not possible to estimate with any accuracy the effect of the change, it is sufficient to say that whatever effect is produced will be beneficial to the people of the United States who use these commodities.

Before leaving the subject, it may be well to say that laths are reduced from 20 cents per 1,000 pieces to 10 cents per 1,000 pieces; shingles from 50 cents per 1,000 to 30 cents per 1,000; lumber, planed or finished on one side, from $1 to $1.75 per 1,000 feet, to 50 cents per 1,000 feet.

And so on. I need not repeat the table that I have prepared.

Now, Mr. President, without taking the time of the Senate to read further from this, it is apparent that upon the free list the concession given by Canada to us is exceedingly slight. The concession given to us upon the reciprocal dutiable list is also very slight, and it is impossible that these reductions and these admissions to the free list shall have any serious or great effect upon our export trade. However, I am not objecting to the agreement upon that ground, for I believe, as I said yesterday, that Canada has given us in this arrangement practically all she can give us.

The only inference I desire you to draw is that if you want to relieve the people of the country from unjust burdens by way of high duties the logical, the reasonable, the just way in which to proceed would be to reduce all our duties, having reference upon the one side, if that party is in power, to its doctrine of a revenue tariff, or upon our side, if we are in power, to reduce them according to the acknowledged standard established by the last Republican convention.

But, coming now to another phase of it, what I propose to do is first to put lumber on the free list so far as Canada is concerned. What objection have the Senators upon the other side of this Chamber to putting lumber on the free list? I am not assuming that you are doing wisely in putting agricultural products upon the free list. You say that to put the farmer into free competition with Canada will not seriously injure him. Do you think it will seriously injure the lumberman, the owner of the great areas of pine lands, to put his product upon the free list? Will it injure him? If it is true that the conditions abroad are substantially the same as the conditions at home, why will you not add lumber to the free list, so far as Canada is concerned, not asking Canada to do anything for us in that respect, but for the sake of your own people, if you are trying to do justice to them and believe that free lumber will enable the farmer, or, indeed, any other citizen of the Republic who desires to use this commodity—if you believe it will do him or them some good, why are you not willing to put lumber on the free list?

You can not answer by saying that you fear that this will imperil the agreement. Canada surely will not object to the enlargement of our free list in that respect. Who will object? Only the lumberman; only the owner of great areas of pine lands. You can not allege that the authorities who are responsible for this arrangement will object because you put lumber on our free list. It is one of the things that we have been trying to accomplish. If you want to enable the farmer to deal as freely in the lumber market as you propose to compel him to deal with respect to wheat and oats and all the other agricultural products, why will you not attach lumber to the free list?

If you do not—I will not say what I was about to say, but I will say that your action in that respect will be as mysterious to me as has been the action of those who have proposed the arrangement now before us.

Again, my amendment seeks to put coal on the free list, so far as the United States is concerned. It is a natural product. Coal has hitherto borne a duty of 53 cents a ton when imported from the United States into Canada. It has borne since the Payne-Aldrich tariff law a duty of 45 cents a ton when imported from Canada into the United States. The effect of this arrangement is that Canada reduces her duty 8 cents a ton and permits our coal to enter Canada at 45 cents per ton.

I am not now to enter into a discussion whether coal ought to be made free or not. There are many on this side of the Chamber who believe it ought not to be free. I believe it ought to be free. Do you upon the other side believe it ought to be free? Do the Senators who fought here for some amelioration of the burdens of the protective system believe that coal ought to be free? If you do, why will you not attach it to the free list so that if the reduction of duties does have any effect upon the price of commodities the farmer when he takes his wheat into a free market can return with his wagon loaded with free coal?

Do you say it will imperil this agreement? Why? I do not ask that Canada shall admit our coal free. I am only asking some compensating advantage to our buyers of coal. And yet you stand firm and resolute against allowing the people of this country to enjoy whatever benefits may arise from free coal with Canada.

The authorities who are responsible for this arrangement can not object to introducing free coal, because Canada will hail with delight the opportunity to enter our markets with her coal without paying duty.

Again, I ask that iron ore shall be put upon the free list. Do you believe iron ore should bear a duty? I do not know just what your views are with respect to that, but I have long contended for free iron ore. I want to see iron ore free, not only with Canada but with every other country upon the face of the earth, and I intend to vote at every opportunity I have to make iron ore free. But the only chance we will have in the immediate future to allow iron ore to enter the United States free is the iron ore of Canada. You who complain of the monopoly of the United States Steel Corporation, you who complain of the gradual concentration of the source of supply in the hands of one corporation, can not, as it seems to me, refuse to add to this arrangement free iron ore from Canada.

Canada will not object; the President can not object; and therefore why do you stand resolute and determined that there shall be no change of the arrangement in this respect?

My amendment proposes to put meat on the free list. Tell me why you want to maintain a duty on meat as between Canada and the United States? Tell me why, after the cattle of our country are driven to a free market, the owner of those cattle should not return at least with free meat? Tell me why you desire to increase the advantages of the packer, of the monopoly, of the combination of men and capital that manufacture cattle into meat? Why do you want to give them free cattle, free raw material, and thus enlarge the profits they now enjoy? I can not understand the attitude of men who believe in the reduction of duties and who refuse to avail themselves of this opportunity to secure it. Canada will not protest against allowing her meat to come into the United States free. She will regard it as an additional reason why she ought to accept this arrangement. I do not know of anyone who is protesting against free meat except the packers, and are we here for the purpose of making the business of the packers more profitable than it is now? You can not tell the country that you refused to put free meat into this agreement because it will endanger the final consummation of the arrangement. For Canada wants free meat into the United States; the people of this country want free meat from Canada; and therefore who is the objector? There is no objector from the ranks of those who sincerely desire some relief to the consumers of the United States.

It is idle for any man to stand before the country and say that he votes against free meat because he fears that the Executive of this country will decline to give his approval to the bill if it provides for free meat. No one is authorized to speak for the Chief Executive, I am sure, in making any such assertion. I will not believe that he could by any possibility object to this addition to the present arrangement. On the contrary, believing him to be a patriot, believing him to want the highest welfare of the people of his own land, he will hail, and must hail, with great gratification the proposal I have just made.

Again, I want free flour attached to this bill. Why do you want to tax flour? Why do you want the millers of Minneapolis and of other parts of the country, whom we may assume are already enjoying all the profits that are reasonable and fair to be reaped from any business, to still further accumulate fortunes at the expense of the producer of the raw material?

If you can give me any reason why flour of all kinds and cereal foods of all kinds and all the by-products of the miller, the coarse feed for animals, and all other things of that sort, shall not be permitted to come from Canada free into the United States I will listen with great attention and with great interest to that reason.

If you could say of this, as you have said already with regard to independent measures of reform, that if they were attached to this bill you have reason to believe that it would not become a law, I can understand that, although I do not agree to its soundness. I do not agree that there is reason to believe that the bill would be rejected if these things were added to it. But you have no reason to believe, nor has any man any reason to believe, that this bill would be less gratifying to the executive department of the Government or less satisfactory to the Canadian Parliament if we were to give her free meat or free flour and free manufactured products of all cereals.

I shall look forward with a great deal of interest to discover what reason will be given to the people of this country for closing the door to this opportunity. I want free agricultural implements. Do you want free agricultural implements? Apparently not, because I propose in this amendment to add to our free list agricultural implements of all kinds. I do not ask Canada to grant the same concession, because I am arguing this, or trying to argue it, upon the theory that it will pass and that we must not do anything which will make the agreement less satisfactory to Canada.

Of course, I think Canada ought to give us free agricultural implements, but fearing that she will not, and not desiring to be open to the reproach that I am urging these amendments for the purpose of defeating the bill, I have only asked that our door be opened and that we allow Canada to open hers whenever she may think the welfare of her country demands it.

I have put iron and steel upon the free list. Who will object to putting all kinds of manufactured iron and steel upon the free list so far as Canada is concerned? It may be that some one on our side may utter a protest, but those upon the other side are estopped from entering any protest against allowing free trade with Canada in the manufactured forms of iron and steel. I do not insist that Canada could do much at this time to correct the abuses of which we are gravely and seriously cognizant, because I think we produce most of these things as cheaply as they can be produced anywhere in the world, and certainly as cheaply as they can be produced in Canada. But here we are groaning under the tyranny of the United States Steel Corporation, and we want to do whatsoever we can to invite from some quarter or other a rival, a competitor, that will help to relieve the American people of the burden which they suffer. This would be an invitation to independent manufacturers in Canada to enter the business and to enter the markets of the United States, and some time or other we might secure a partial remedy for the evil that we now endure.

What is the objection to putting woolen goods upon the free list, so far as Canada is concerned? Do you think Canada will object? Do you think the President will object? No: if we have heard aright, the Chief Executive is insistent that we shall pass some bill that will put into effect the reciprocal arrangement which he has proposed and which he has consummated; but I hope he has not indicated, I do not believe he has indicated, his disinclination to approve any measure that will open still wider commercially the doors of the United States to Canada.

So with cotton, and so with silk, and so with leather.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice the Senator's amendment provides for free woolen goods. Would not that be a disadvantage to the American manufacturer on this account——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it would. I want it to be.

Mr. SMOOT. Canada has free wool and we have protected wool. Therefore they would not be on the same basis, and it would be a great disadvantage to the American manufacturer.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it would help to bring the American manufacturer down to the point of reasonable profit, anyhow.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to go further than that and have an understanding as to the effect of the Senator's amendment. The Senator certainly understands that his amendment provides that free woolen goods shall come into this country from Canada. If that is the case, would not the Canadian manufacturer have a great advantage over the American manufacturer in this way, that he is entitled to import wool free and the American manufacturer is not entitled to import wool free? Then the Canadian manufacturer would have his free raw material, or wool, as he calls it, without duty, and he would have just that advantage over the American manufacturer.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think he would, Mr. President; but that advantage is not commensurate, or more than commensurate, with the advantage that the American woolen manufacturer has in his established plant and in his established business. I for one, while we are putting articles upon the free list, am perfectly willing to see this country endure such competition as Canada can furnish in woolen goods, as well as in all other kinds of goods, for I began this argument by the statement that I am entirely willing to vote for free trade with Canada simply because I believe—and in that respect I am in concurrence with the President—that, taking all things together, Canada does not manufacture under more favorable conditions than we do.

I know that there is a hardship in free trade with respect to certain agricultural products. I know, and every Senator must know, that with respect to some of the agricultural products, Canada can produce and will produce more cheaply than it is possible for the American farmer to produce. But taking the subject as a whole I think the United States could compete with Canada; and my great complaint is that we select the one thing in which we have no advantage, and indeed are at a disadvantage as compared with Canada, to establish free trade, and leave the great body of the manufactured products, concerning which we have some advantage over Canada, still protected by high protective duties.

I regard it as the most illogical, the most indefensible proposition that has ever been put before the American people, and I am simply trying to make it better, to make it so that I can vote for it, for I do have a real desire to express my sympathy with the movement for freer and broader trade relations with the Dominion. But it now seems impossible for me to give it my assent so long as the invidious, the unjust discrimination found in the bill is perpetuated.

I now intend to take up for a little while the question of the favored-nation clause, and I hope that those who are interested in that will follow me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator from Iowa passes to the next point, I should like to ask him a question for information. If you amended the Canadian reciprocity bill by putting upon it free manufactured woolen goods and free agricultural implements and free manufactured steel and iron, how many stand-pat Republican votes on that side of the Chamber does the Senator suppose the bill as amended would receive?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know; but I know that there are enough Senators upon this side of the Chamber who, added to the Senators upon the other side, will pass the bill if so amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As amended?

Mr. CUMMINS. As amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And send it on to the White House involving Canadian reciprocity in the speculation as regards a veto.

But to go back to this arena, not to the other end of the Avenue, because I believe some of us were lectured the other day about mentioning the other end of the Avenue even when as a practical matter it was very much an element in a rational consideration of what we should do here, does the Senator give it as his opinion that all the class of Senators who are called by their enemies insurgents and by themselves progressives would vote for the bill as amended?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know, because I have had no——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator give it as his opinion?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment; allow me to finish. I do not know because I have had no conference with them upon that particular question, but I do know that the Senator from Mississippi ought to be able to answer for the fate of the bill if it shall go back to the House of Representatives. His political associates are in the majority there, and if they are willing to accept this amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not talking about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. It makes no difference what the Republican Members might do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am talking about the fate of the bill here. Does not the Senator from Iowa think that if all those amendments were placed upon this bill the result would be that the bill would lose the support of every single, solitary Republican Senator who without those amendments would vote for it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared to say that, and I am not prepared to express any opinion about it. I am not, as the Senator knows, in the close confidence of most of the Republican Senators who intend to vote for this bill. Most of them have entertained views with regard to the tariff which I do not entertain. Most of them have spent the best part of their lives trying to maintain duties so high that it requires a modern telescope to see the dizzy altitude of the law.

I do not know what they would do, and I do not pledge any vote, but I do believe that if the bill were amended so that it would be fair and reasonable in the way I have pointed out and shall point out in the future, it would receive enough Republican votes added to those upon the other side of the Chamber to pass the Senate. I do believe that the high authorities which negotiated the arrangement would find no objection to this enlargement. What the Democratic majority in the House might do with regard to the bill in that form I must leave to the better knowledge and better judgment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi has not raised that question and does not care to go into as broad a field of speculation as that, but I imagine it would be awfully difficult to frame reciprocal trade relations with Canada too free for a Democratic House of Representatives if it had any certainty of approval——

Mr. CUMMINS. If that be true the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment; if it had any certainty or feeling of assurance that as amended it would finally go upon the statute book.

Mr, CUMMINS. If the Senator from Mississippi needs no reassurance upon the latter question I am sure that he will speedily reach the conclusion to follow his own conscience and his judgment in trying to make this arrangement better than it is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Continuing the interruption, the Senator from Mississippi is trying to follow his own conscience and his judgment, or would try to follow it, to make this agreement better, with this qualification, that he would not go so far, even in the direction that he himself would like to go in making it better, as to prevent the Canadian reciprocity agreement from being finally written upon the statute book.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have been trying, and evidently vainly trying, to convince the Senator from Mississippi that the better arrangement would meet no peril on its way to a completed law. If I have not succeeded I must either assume that my arguments are without that weight which I hoped they possessed or that the Senator from Mississippi is deaf to reason.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, before he passes to the subject which he has indicated as the one which he is now about to take up, I wish to make one suggestion to him. I do not know that I will put it in the shape of an interrogatory.

The Senator has been pressing with very great earnestness, and I may say at times with great eloquence, the feature which he alleges in this proposed reciprocity legislation is one of very great injustice in the fact that it proposes that a particular industry—the farming industry—shall be relieved from the protection the law now gives it against foreign competition, and at the same time the farmer be compelled to buy in a protected market.

I want to say to the Senator that that argument appeals with very great force to Senators from my section of the country, because in the political domination of the party to which the Senator belongs we have been accustomed to that in the most pronounced form for the past 40 or 50 years—that is, those of us who have lived long enough for that to be the case. It matters not, Mr. President, whether that condition is brought about by the enactment of law or whether it exists in the nature of things, so long as the result is the same.

The Senator spoke very eloquently yesterday of the great injustice of compelling the farmer to sell in a free market and manacling him, as he expressed it, and compelling him to buy in a protected market. I simply want to say to the Senator that this legislation, if it shall be enacted, will bring to the farmers in the northern part of this country a realization of the great injustice which has been done to their brethren in the southern part of this country during all the time of the enactment and enforcement of a protective-tariff law. While the law does not condemn the southern cotton producer to sell in a free market, conditions do, as absolutely as law possibly could, produce this effect. At the same time, those engaged in this immense industry, one of which, as I stated a few days ago, the product is worth one thousand million dollars a year, have been compelled to buy in a protected market everything which they have used. As to every article for the support of themselves and their families and every article of machinery or other appliance used in the production of their cotton, they have been, in the language of the Senator, manacled and compelled to buy in a protected market.

I am free to say to the Senator that I do not think that that is a good argument why we should inflict a similar injustice upon any other farmers, and for that reason I said I was not going to put it in the shape of an inquiry, but I thought at this time it was well that the argument the Senator has been urging with so much force and eloquence should go home to the people at large, that the great iniquity—I use a word probably that might be offensive; I will say the injustice—of the protective-tariff system is that it is absolutely impossible of equal application, and that it is impossible that you can so frame a protective-tariff law so that whatever benefits may come shall be equal in their application and in their effect. I thought I would take the liberty of suggesting that in connection with the very strong and earnest argument which the Senator has been making upon that line.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have long felt and I now feel the very great force of the suggestion made by the Senator. If there had been any way of controlling the natural laws of trade and commerce, every fair-minded man must have admitted in all these years that the cotton grower in the South was entitled to the same advantage that had been claimed for the grain grower of the North. If there were any way of reaching the injustice which has been so often pointed out, I would be very glad to join him in an effort to reach it; but the Senator from Georgia knows that with respect to at least a great mass of the productions of the South there is no way of reaching it except along the path that we are now trying to walk, namely, the reduction of the duties which enhance the price of the things the southern farmer must buy and the removal of the duty entirely whenever to so remove it will not destroy the business of the domestic producer.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I think the Senator could go still further and say that in a case of such necessity as that, and such consequent gross injustice growing out of that necessity, there can be no possible excuse for putting upon any article that the southern planter has to use in producing his cotton any tariff other than a revenue tariff; in other words, there can be no possible defense for putting upon any article used by him in that production any tariff which is to inure to the benefit of an individual.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is very hard to gainsay what has just been stated by the Senator from Georgia; but I now address myself to the question that has arisen with regard to the favored-nation clause. It has been said many times, I think, that if we were to add to this arrangement any concession that did not find its equivalent in a Canadian concession, or, to put it more concretely still, if the Senate should now exercise the power that it unquestionably has and do the thing which it should unquestionably do from my standpoint, and add to the concessions to Canada without receiving other concessions from Canada, we would be compelled, under the favored-nation clause of our various treaties, to extend those concessions to every country between which and our own such a treaty is in existence. In my opinion—and I do not profess great familiarity with the diplomatic or international law in this respect—the arrangement in its present form is in greater danger of meeting and being drawn within the favored-nation clause than it would be if amended as I have proposed and if additional concessions were granted to Canada without asking from Canada anything in return.

The difficulty with the bill in its present form is this: That it seems to contemplate compensation, article by article—that is to say, that we grant to Canada free wheat because Canada grants to us free wheat; that we grant to her free cattle because Canada grants to us free cattle; that we reduce the duty a quarter of a cent a pound on meat because Canada reduces her duty to the same point on meat. I fear—although I do not assert it with any positiveness or even with great confidence—that if this bill becomes a law and goes into effect, then any other country can take any article named in this arrangement, and, upon giving us the precise equivalent which seems to be given here, can claim the admission of that article into our markets upon the terms that we now grant to Canada.

There is another objection to the arrangement in its present form, so far as the favored-nation clause is concerned. We do not in and by the proposed law terminate our concessions to Canada at the time that Canada may terminate her concessions to us. As I remarked yesterday, Canada in a month or a day after these laws, hers and our own, shall go into effect, can repeal her law, can withdraw from us every concession that she has granted, and still our law remains in full force and effect, and the duties which we here prescribe will be the duties that will be levied against Canadian imports until Congress shall exercise its right of repealing or modifying the statute which we are about to pass. I fear that foreign nations, with which we have treaties of the character I have described, will say that this is not reciprocity, that it is not the extension to Canada of certain concessions in consideration of concessions granted by her to us, but that it is simply an adjustment of our tariff law in its relation to Canada, which may continue, and which, so far as its terms are concerned, will continue as to Canada without regard to the perpetuation of the status which may be established by any Canadian enactment.

These are questions which may well deserve and do well deserve the thoughtful attention of those who are interested in our foreign relations. I pass them, however, to announce these propositions: First, that it is now for Congress to make just such proposals to Canada as it may see fit to make, and that we are not embarrassed nor can what we do ever be weighed or determined or measured by anything that has occurred in the exchanges of diplomacy between the State Department of our Government and the ministers of the Dominion of Canada. This is a subject of which we have jurisdiction, and if we now propose to give to Canada certain things as a whole for certain things which Canada shall give to us as a whole, then foreign nations in construing or in passing upon the arrangement must consider the proposal as emanating from and originating in the Congress of the United States, for that body alone has the power to change or to determine what our tariff duties shall be.

I do not intend, Senators, to go elaborately into the history of the favored-nation clause, but it is interesting for us to know what has occurred between this and other nations in order to reach a conclusion upon the proposition that I have just made. Assuming now that this bill were so amended as to admit to its free list every article which I have proposed to put upon the free list, and that no additional concession were asked from Canada, I still maintain that under the favored-nation clause of our treaties, as uninterruptedly construed and interpreted from the beginning of the Government until the present moment, no other nation could claim the advantages which we would thus confer upon Canada.

So far as we are concerned, Mr. President, this subject was first put into the form of a provision in a treaty in 1778. May I be permitted to go back just a little into history before I read the provisions of our first treaty in that respect? This matter had been the subject of treaties amongst the countries of the civilized world for a hundred years before the American Nation came into existence. There had been employed during all that time among those nations a clause which was substantially without condition—that is to say, a clause which operated automatically to admit into the markets of the country a party to the treaty the imports of any other country with which it had a treaty upon the same duties and terms that had been conferred upon any particular or favored nation, without regard to whether the favor was conferred for a concession or otherwise; in other words, the nations of the world had before this time largely, not altogether, employed what is known in the world of diplomacy and international law as the unconditional favored-nation clause.

Mr. President, it has been suggested to me that possibly I ought to defer and might well defer the discussion of this question, which is very important, and I am sure it will be interesting—not in my presentation of it, but because of its own significance—until a later time. I felt a little guilty this morning in occupying the time that had been preempted, and properly preempted, by the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE]. I feel that he ought to be allowed to go forward with his observations. I shall take up this question, however, if I can secure the floor, on next Wednesday; and I now ask unanimous consent that on next Thursday the pending question shall be considered and voted upon during that legislative day.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator mean the pending question or the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). The Senator referred to the pending question, which is——

Mr. CUMMINS. The pending question—I think I have stated it with entire accuracy—is upon the adoption of the amendments which I have offered, which are before the Senate and which constitute the pending question.

Mr. SMOOT. I may be mistaken. I thought, of course, the pending question was the reciprocity bill itself.

Mr. CUMMINS. The pending question is the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest to the Senator to ask for a vote prior to adjournment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not yet finished my request.

Mr. PENROSE. I beg pardon.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the pending question—and I will state the request so that there shall be no doubt about it—being the series of amendments offered by myself, shall be voted upon before adjournment upon that legislative day, and that the question shall be, upon the motion of any Senator, divided according to the rules of the Senate and of parliamentary law.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I want to inquire if that means if there should be a prolonged discussion in regard to the separate and individual amendments the Senate could take a recess until Friday or Saturday, or so long as the discussion might last on these amendments? I would not want to consent to a vote on the calendar day of Thursday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not asking for that. I am asking that a vote be taken on that legislative day, to be continued so long as may be required to reach a vote.

Mr. BRISTOW. A parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know if under the unanimous consent these proposed amendments of the Senator from Iowa can be voted upon separately? There are a number of them that I am very anxious to vote for, but I do not know whether I would want to vote for all of them or not. But for most of them I do. I should like to have an opportunity of voting on the amendments individually and separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the opinion of the Chair that it is the right of any Senator to have a pending amendment divided where it consists of two independent propositions and an independent vote upon any independent proposition, irrespective of any agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will now ask to finish my request, that the votes be taken by the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly see what advantage we would gain by granting the request if the measure is to be discussed day after day. If there was some time fixed to vote, I would be glad to consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. That fixes the legislative day. It is precisely the agreement that the chairman of the Finance Committee asked and secured with respect to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

I do not consider it important to fix an hour for this vote, and I understand that is not the wish of the Senator from Iowa. But I certainly think there ought to be something in this understanding that no recess shall be taken to prolong the legislative day until the following calendar day. In other words, that this shall be the final disposition of these pending amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not, as the author of the request——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment.

I would not, as the author of the request, want to preclude the right of the Senate to take a recess if it is desired to do it. I myself would hope there would be no recess, but I do not want to put that into the request for unanimous consent. I think I can assure the Senator from Pennsylvania that so far as I am concerned there will be no desire, no inclination, to postpone by a single moment beyond the time when Senators desire to speak upon the amendments the disposition of them.

I have made this request largely in order to advise Senators of the time when the amendments will probably be disposed of. I am not insisting upon the request at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire—I was not here when the Senator made his request—what is the request?

Mr. CUMMINS. The request is that the pending question, which consists of the series of amendments I have offered to the bill, shall be voted upon next Thursday—the legislative day of next Thursday—and that the votes be taken by the yeas and nays, and that the right of division of the question, which undoubtedly exists, shall be preserved, so that votes can be taken upon the separate amendments in so far as they involve separate subjects.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, I have no disposition to interpose any objection to the earliest possible consideration and action upon these amendments and the bill. But I want to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that there are those who desire to speak upon some of the amendments which he has offered. I myself desire to address myself somewhat at length to several of the amendments which the Senator has offered, and I shall probably offer some amendments on the same line, somewhat different from those offered by the Senator. I do not think I can get ready to speak by that time. And assuring the Senator that I have no disposition to interfere with fixing the earliest practicable date, so as to allow those who wish to speak an opportunity to do so, I suggest that he name some later date to vote on the amendments, so as to give Senators on this side an opportunity to speak. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] at my left suggests to me that he also desires to speak.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there must be some misapprehension about the effect of the unanimous agreement for which I ask. The effect of it, as I stated, is that on Thursday, at the close of the morning business, the question would be taken up and the debate would be continued until no further debate was desired, and that then we would begin to vote upon the amendments. My only purpose, as I say——

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator to mean we would just continue the legislative day by the process of taking a recess?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the debate be not concluded on the calendar day, it would be necessary to take a recess, of course.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The difficulty about that, if the Senator will permit, is this: Senators who desire to speak on this question have to make some preparation for it, and they would not know, they could not possibly know, how long that legislative day was going to be extended. In case they did not feel they would be able to make their speech on Thursday or Friday, they would feel much safer if a later day were fixed before which the vote shall not be taken.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

I have in addition to the purpose I mentioned a moment ago another, which is to indicate to the country and to Senators that those of us who feel that this bill ought not to be passed, at least in its present form, are not disposed to prolong unduly and unnecessarily the debate.

The Senator from North Carolina understands perfectly that some of us have been very severely arraigned for what is alleged to be an effort to prevent the adjournment of Congress within reasonable time. I am not conscious of any such purpose. I intend to stay here until these questions can be thoroughly and completely debated, and then I am ready to vote, and I ask for this consent in order to indicate my desire to speed the bill as well as my desire that all Senators could thus be notified of approximately the time at which a vote would be taken, and therefore all could be here.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will understand that I am laboring under the same embarrassment that he is. I am, with him, opposed to the passage of this bill, but I do not desire to do anything that could possibly be construed into a purpose to delay action. I want speedy action. But at the same time I think the Senator is a little hasty, and his proposition does not allow reasonable time for the discussion of the very important amendments which he has offered. They are amendments which go to the most vital phases of this question, and they ought to be pretty thoroughly discussed before there is a vote upon them.

I know there are several Senators here who desire to discuss them. As we will probably adjourn over until Wednesday, if the present proposition were to prevail there would be very little time given for discussion on amendments.

I am just as anxious as is the Senator—that is, what I mean to say now—to preclude any suggestion that I am making opposition to his present suggestion in any way to obstruct quick action and early action.

Mr. CUMMINS. What would the Senator from North Carolina think about Friday?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would not myself object to fixing Monday of next week, or if the Senator prefers, Saturday. I think at least two days—Wednesday, Thursday, Friday; three days—would not be more than is needed to discuss the Senator's amendments.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. I thoroughly appreciate the disposition of the Senator from Iowa to expedite the consideration of this measure. Some days ago he introduced these amendments. There is a long series of them. They are all amendments of importance. Day before yesterday the Senator occupied the floor in a speech of considerable length. He spoke excellently well, as he always does. Yesterday he again occupied the floor through most of the session, and spoke well, of course. To-day he has again occupied the floor up to this time, to the entertainment and instruction of the Senate. Now he serves notice that on next Wednesday he expects again to take the time of the Senate in a discussion of these amendments, and follows this notice by proposing, in the interest of economy in the time of the Senate, that we now fix Thursday as a continuous legislative day as the time to vote on and finally dispose of these amendments. In all probability the Senate, on account of the Fourth of July, will not be in session Saturday, Monday, or Tuesday.

I submit to the Senator whether down at bottom he regards that as a generous, or even just, proposition?

Mr. CUMMINS. I answer the Senator from Indiana in this way; I have made such inquiries as I could, and I have not found anybody who wants to speak upon these amendments.

Mr. SHIVELY. Is that the reason the Senator has felt constrained to occupy so much time on them?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Indiana need not expend his wit upon me.

Mr. SHIVELY. I am not. It is not a question of wit.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have made my request in perfectly good faith. If the Senator from Indiana wants to object, it is entirely within his province.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator from Indiana has interposed no objection. But the Senator from Indiana must be permitted to address himself to the reason of the Senator from Iowa on the proposition which the Senator himself has submitted to the Senate, and to suggest whether, after having occupied the floor for three or four days, he regards it as quite the right thing to propose that immediately after he gets through we shall commence voting on the amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not, if I had any reason to believe that any other Senator desired to address the Senate with regard to these amendments. Everybody knows that when these amendments are disposed of then there will come forward certain other amendments touching the general tariff, and I am very anxious that we shall get along with the whole subject as rapidly as we can.

If the Senator from Indiana, or any other Senator either upon this side of the Chamber or the other, will suggest even that further debate is likely I will very gladly withdraw my request. I should like to see these amendments debated for a long time, if others will take up the debate.

Mr. SHIVELY. I hardly think the Senator can be in the dark on that question. The Senator from North Carolina just announced to him that he himself desires to discuss some of these amendments. He also took the privilege of announcing that the Senator from Tennessee wished to submit remarks. So the Senator from Iowa is not without information on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to say he proposed to offer amendments of his own on the same general subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said I desired to address myself to some of the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa and to offer some myself on the same line.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am delighted to know that I have aroused some interest in these amendments, and debate can not continue too long to suit me, so long as the debate, I am sure, will promote chances of their adoption. And I therefore withdraw the request that I made for unanimous consent.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I regret that the Senate has not seen its way to grant the consent asked for by the Senator from Iowa. I desire to state that after the reassembling of the Senate on Wednesday, July 5, I shall ask the Senate to meet at an earlier hour in the morning, and to vote down motions for early adjournments, so that Senators who have exhibited this desire to speak on these matters may have full opportunity to do so.

Mr. SHIVELY. Why does not the Senator fix that now, so that every Senator will be on notice that we are going to meet at an earlier hour?

Mr. PENROSE. I will take my own——

Mr. SHIVELY. I will join the Senator from Pennsylvania in that.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no objection to doing it now; and I will move that——

Mr. SMOOT. We have an order to-day. We already have one order. Beginning Thursday is all right.

Mr. PENROSE. While I personally am perfectly willing to make the motion now, in view of the fact that one order has been made this morning, I will not press it. I assure the Senator from Indiana that Wednesday next I shall move that the Senate hold its meetings at an earlier hour until otherwise ordered.

Mr. SHIVELY. I assure the Senator from Pennsylvania I will join most heartily in support of that motion.

Mr. PENROSE. I am very glad, indeed, to hear that the motion will have the cooperation and help of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to state that I have no dispositon personally to delay a vote on the Canadian reciprocity bill and the amendments to it, but I am not disposed to agree to fixing a time at which the vote shall be taken, because frequently I think we can vote quicker by not fixing a time than by fixing a time.

Then I want to make another suggestion, and that is, after the reciprocity bill is disposed of, the unfinished business is off of the calendar, there are some other matters to which I think the Senate should give attention before Congress adjourns. I think the bill for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico should be disposed of at this extra session. I am in sympathy with any movement that hastens our proceedings and still gives full opportunity for discussion; but it seems to me that Senators should have in mind that when the Canadian bill is disposed of there are a number of other measures that will be before the Senate which are just as important, and, from my point of view, much more important than this Canadian bill.

I make this statement because I do not want the impression made throughout the country that Canadian reciprocity is the only legislative matter that is before Congress at this session.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to speak at undue length on the pending measure. The subject already has been very fully discussed by others. I, however, consider the provisions of the pending agreement a matter of tremendous import to such a large class of our population, and, in my judgment, it is striking such a severe and unwarranted blow at the agricultural interests of our country I feel it a duty to myself and to the people of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent to give my views thereon.

I am a Republican and have full faith in my party, and for years have been guided by its policies and have sought to follow its traditions. Being a Republican, it necessarily follows I am and have been a protectionist. As a result of that policy the people of our country for the past 50 years in their manifold activities have steadily advanced in unparalleled prosperity and material achievements.

Under this policy the Republican Party since it became responsible for legislation has given the country an opportunity for its greatest progress and development. During all these years, with only one exception, the protective principle has been the fixed and permanent policy of the Government. During this time our progress and development have been unequaled in the history of the world. It has added to our wealth, developed our resources, extended our commerce, and multiplied our activities. Under its stimulating influence we have become the dominant force amongst the governments of the world.

Since the inauguration of the protective policy by the Republican Party we have accumulated and added to our material wealth upward of $110,000,000,000, which is practically one-fourth of the wealth of civilization. Under the same policy and the range of prices therefor from the wealth of the soil our agricultural production is the greatest in value each year of any people in the world. There has been built up under the same system our manufacturing establishments that produce each year practically one-third of the manufactured product of the world. As a result our export trade exceeds that of any of the governments of civilization.

We therefore should take care that the matter now in hand should not invade the protective principle of the party and imperil the prosperity of any class of our people or overthrow through this process the bulwark of protection that has made possible our marvelous development and accomplishments.

This policy, in my judgment, has given the fullest and most enlarged opportunities to our own people to do their own work, to employ their own capital, to maintain and preserve their own market, and not to suffer displacement in either in the world's competition. It has reserved to the American wage earner unequaled opportunities and has protected him against foreign competition and the lower level of wages and of living in other lands. Under our economic system it has always been the concern of the Republican Party to protect the home market, both as it relates to the producer, the manufacturer, as well as to labor.

The principle of protection was clearly defined in the last national Republican platform as follows:

> In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as would equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

As to the clearness and meaning of the rule laid down there can be no controversy. The difference in the cost of production at home and abroad should be susceptible of demonstration, and with that determined the rates then should be fixed in relation therewith, and, in addition, a preference given to American capital for investment with a reasonable profit.

In conformity to the principle so declared the Payne bill of 1909 created a Tariff Board, and an appropriation was made to pursue such investigation, so that in any future revision of the tariff exact data and information would be available. Last year a much larger appropriation was made by Congress to insure the thoroughness and efficiency of such investigation and the result secured at the earliest practicable time. Legislation more extended and complete was sought in the last Congress looking to the creation of a tariff commission to more successfully prosecute the work in hand, that all essential data and exact information might be secured. Unfortunately the measure failed, even after it had passed both Houses with substantially the same provisions.

The highest obligation is imposed upon Congress to enact the legislation in question. It is in line and in sympathy, I believe, with the judgment of a large majority of the people of the country. Full and exact information thus secured would make more effectual and certain as well as just any future legislation that may be had upon the tariff. At any rate, an ample appropriation was made for the coming fiscal year for the carrying on of the work of the present Tariff Board, whose efficiency and competency will, I believe, be amply justified when its reports are made.

Reciprocity has been defined in our national platforms, and it has been the guiding principle governing the party when it has had to do with either negotiations or legislation thereon. It is well defined in the Republican platform of 1900, as follows:

> We favor the associated policy of reciprocity so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

In the Republican national platform of 1904 the party further declared:

> We have extended widely our foreign markets, and we believe in the adoption of all practicable methods for their further extension, including commercial reciprocity wherever reciprocal arrangements can be effected consistent with the principles of protection and without injury to American agriculture, American labor, or any American industry.

The principle of reciprocity was most clearly and succinctly stated by the late President McKinley in his first inaugural address, as follows:

> The end in view always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves, and which do not involve any loss of labor of our own people, but tend to increase their prosperity.

The principle of reciprocity has been interpreted and followed by all of the great leaders of the party. It perhaps was never more clearly stated than by the late Charles Emory Smith:

> When readily understood the principle is axiomatic. Brazil grows coffee, but makes no machinery. We make machinery, but grow no coffee. She needs the fabrics of our factories and forges, and we need the fruits of her tropical soil. We agree to concessions for her coffee, and she agrees to concessions for our machinery. That is reciprocity.

To my mind reciprocity means reciprocal and fair exchanges between different countries as far as may be in noncompeting products. It seems to me a fair and just reciprocal arrangement between the United States and Canada that is just and fair to every interest is much to be desired. I do not wish to be understood as opposing such a reciprocal agreement. It occurs to me, however, the measure proposed is unjust, unfair, un-Republican, and is in violation of the declared and settled policy of the party for more than a generation. It means to me a serious and unwarranted blow to the American farmer which places him in an unequal and unfair competition with his Canadian rival without any fair or just compensation in return for the protection that is now accorded him under existing law.

This is not the first experience our country has had in reciprocity with Canada. The treaty of 1854 was injurious and inimical to the prosperity and welfare of the people of the United States. It retarded our industrial and commercial development, and was unjust to practically every interest. Although patiently borne until 1866, it was then renounced.

Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years in Congress, makes the following comments, among other severe criticisms of this treaty:

> The selection of the commodities, as shown by the schedule, was made almost wholly to favor Canadian interests. There was scarcely a product in the list which could be exported from the United States to Canada without loss, while the great market of the United States was thrown open to Canada without tax or charge for nearly everything which she could produce and export. All her raw materials were admitted free, while all our manufactures were charged with heavy duty, the market being reserved for English merchants.

Mr. Fielding, in speaking in the Canadian Parliament of the present agreement soon after it was promulgated, stated:

> It is the reciprocity treaty of 1854 over again, with comparatively little change. It promises prosperity to the people of Canada, and this House would make a grave mistake and do a grave wrong if it would refuse to take advantage of it.

The history of the operations of the treaty of 1854 discloses the fact that we remitted to the Canadian Government many millions of dollars in duties, and instead of there being a balance of trade in our favor as it had been under normal conditions, during the greater part of the time while it was in force it was largely against us. When the treaty was ratified the balance of trade in our favor annually was $8,000,000. At its close the balance against us was $30,000,000. Under such conditions, considering the unfortunate experience we have heretofore had and the loss we then suffered without material gain, is it wise or the part of good statesmanship to practically renew an agreement that in the first instance proved so disastrous to our producing and commercial interests?

Mr. President, I can not persuade myself that in any sense this agreement follows either the rule of our party faith in the policy of protection or in that of reciprocity. As far as I am concerned I can not vote for its enactment or its ratification. It is neither protective nor reciprocal, but diametrically at variance, in my judgment, with both. Had it been proposed by the opposition, I could readily appreciate it as in line somewhat with their sympathies and their policy. When first submitted to the last Congress it was promptly and unanimously adopted at a caucus of the Democratic Party of the House of Representatives on January 31 last. It was reported from the Ways and Means Committee in the House of the last Congress by a vote of 12 to 7—6 Republicans and 6 Democrats for and 6 Republicans and 1 Democrat against. It was thereafter passed through the other House by the full vote of the Democratic Party, with only five exceptions, and with a minority of the Republican membership. It was reported to the Senate from the Finance Committee of the last Congress without recommendation, and the Senate declined to consider it.

It was passed through the present House by a vote of 267 for to 89 against. The number of Democrats who voted in favor of it was 199; against it, 11. The number of Republicans who voted in favor of it was 67, and against it 78. It was reported by the Finance Committee to the Senate without recommendation.

Under such conditions it can hardly be claimed this is a Republican measure, as far as legislative action so far is concerned. I feel at liberty, therefore, and am disposed, to exercise my own convictions thereon, independent of Executive action.

I desire, however, Mr. President, to express my high opinion of and confidence in the wisdom, the character, the patriotism, and unselfish devotion to the public service of the President of the United States. He has the highest ideals of public service, is unselfishly and patriotically devoting himself and his administration to the solution of great problems that immediately concern the present and future well-being of the Republic. The record this administration has made in advanced, substantial, progressive, and constructive legislation, and in the vigor, energy, and effectiveness of its enforcement of law against concentrated and powerful monopolies is unequaled by any administration during the same length of time.

With the highest respect for the President and great confidence in his wisdom, I am, however, unwilling to follow him in the proposed legislation. This I very much regret, but to do so would do violence to my highest convictions and firm sense of right.

I have no criticism to make upon the President for the course he has pursued. I would have preferred, however, that the Senate, in the first instance, had been advised with and consulted therein, and we would not have here a proposition of Executive origin only to be arbitrarily disposed of. The treaty-making power is vested by the Constitution in the Senate as well as with the Executive, and in that connection it requires a two-thirds vote of the Senate to ratify. In this proposal the two-thirds majority is avoided, and to give vitality to the treaty, which it is, and a revenue measure at the same time, a majority vote of the two Houses only is required.

It, however, is but the ordinary and natural result from the course of the election last fall. The result was a criticism and, to a certain extent, a rebuke to the party in many localities on certain specific rates of the Payne law. Many of the farmers joined in this attack. "The high cost of living," as a result, was the slogan employed by the great consuming public, and with that as a pretext the principle of protection has been overwhelmed and engulfed.

The proposal to my mind, however, is at variance with the policy and traditions of the party. It is not reciprocal. It invites competition in like productions, and the advantages are all in favor of Canada.

The chief sufferers, if it is enacted into law, will be the agricultural producers. It proposes, as far as this country is concerned, to open to our people the market of a country of not over 7,500,000 people, much of whose area is new and undeveloped, and in exchange throw open to them the market places of upward of 92,000,000 people, with their multiplicity of activities and infinity of resources and with inexhaustible consuming power. To my mind it is unequal, and the exchange is all in favor of the Canadian people.

Mr. President, I had supposed it was the fixed policy of the party to take no further step in the revision of the tariff on any of the schedules without first having a report thereon, with exact information as to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad on the schedule or schedules proposed to be revised made by the Tariff Board or tariff commission. It, however, is proposed, as far as the negotiations and the action of the House are concerned, without any such evidence having been submitted or evidence gained or sought to be gained on any of the articles enumerated in the bill from such a source, to revise, alter, change, and modify the rates of duty specified on the articles in question, without, in the first instance, any pretense of evidence or information submitted from the board or from practically any other source. This attack is almost alone made upon the agricultural schedule, and the farmers are to be stripped absolutely of the protection afforded them under the Payne law, without any opportunity for hearing or a suggestion even made as to the exact facts connected therewith, except as given by the Finance Committee of the Senate during the present session.

To all intents and purposes, as far as the American farmer is concerned, it is a revision of the tariff as it affects his interests, and the products of the farm are to be put upon practically a free-trade basis, without any equivalent in reduction of the things he is compelled to buy. In other words, as far as the products of the farm are concerned, they are to be placed upon the free list and the farmer still compelled to buy in a protected market the articles he needs.

As far as H. R. 4413—known as the "farmers' free-list" bill—is concerned, I will only stop to observe it was never intended by its authors to become a law. Its object was political merely. It is illogical, follows no known rule or precedent, is subversive of every principle of tariff legislation, and if enacted into law would be destructive of every interest it aimed to serve. Its further consideration, in my judgment, will not be seriously urged in its present form.

I am free to confess I had somewhat sympathized with the new rule promulgated from high quarters in the party that the true rule in the revision of the tariff was to revise it schedule by schedule. Upon this theory, however, it was clearly understood no revision would be had on any article of any schedule without exact information from the Tariff Board or tariff commission. Whatever delusions I may have had in respect to this have been abruptly dissipated by the program now invoked. The agricultural schedule alone is now opened to attack. Every other interest is ready for the onslaught upon the claim of "the high cost of living."

The farmer is to be sacrificed and his prosperity checked and his opportunity for extension and enlargement curtailed by a combination of every other independent interest. In this respect he is practically helpless to protect himself, by combination or otherwise, to save himself from the general onslaught. If the present program is to be a test of the new doctrine, as far as I am concerned, I feel I am ready to disavow it.

Mr. President, the policy of protection to the western farmer for many years was indirect and largely theoretical. Its chief aim was to give encouragement to and to develop our new and struggling manufacturing industries. It had application to and direct relation largely to the eastern manufacturing interests. The western farmer was far from market and rates of transportation were high. It developed a nearer market; gave employment to labor in the manufacturing establishments; increased the number of consumers and the price of all farm products.

Under the impetus and encouragement of this policy the manufacturing establishments developed and extended westward, seeking locations nearer the source of supply. It increased the consumers, shortened the distances of transportation, lessened the freight charges the farmer originally was compelled to pay, and in the highest sense demonstrated the beneficent effects of the policy of protection and brought in a practical way the agricultural producer and the consumer of his products in close proximity.

In every sense it has had a most salutary effect, both upon the agriculturist, the manufacturer, and labor. It increased farm values, raised the price of farm products; developed a local consumption not only for the products of the farm, but in return gave a market to the manufacturer in the prosperity of the agriculturist.

During the last few years the farmer has largely come into his own, and this result has demonstrated the beneficence and helpfulness of the protective policy. The great body of agriculturists have felt justified and repaid for their loyalty to the party that inaugurated the policy, and, as a rule, have largely sustained it. The producer and the consumer of late have met practically on equal terms, with fair exchange between both.

Is it fair, is it just, is it patriotic, and is it wise when the farmer recognizes his equality and is satisfied with existing conditions that a revision should be inaugurated on the agricultural schedule alone and the farmer stripped of the protection the law now gives him and engulf and overwhelm the home market through free-trade competition in all his products when the reduction upon the things he buys is so meager it in no sense is a just or fair equivalent? Can it be expected the agriculturist is to sustain a party under such a policy which as a result must necessarily depreciate the value of his holdings, make unremunerative his employment, lessen the price of the things he has to sell, and place him in competition with a foreign people where production is had upon cheaper lands with greater productive capacity, with less investment of capital, with rates of wages in many cases less, and he be content to support a policy or a party that is willing to do violence to every sense of right in the farmer's relation to the other members of the citizenship of our country and leave the latter protected in all other interests and place the farmer alone in such unequal competition?

Mr. President, the western farmer for years has been the bulwark of Republican strength and has sustained the party, as a rule, in all crises with rare exceptions. He is intelligent, patriotic, high minded, and believes in fair play. It can hardly be hoped, however, that his highest rights are to be invaded, his possessions depreciated, his products cheapened, and he be expected to cooperate and sustain a policy that proposes to do such violence to him.

Under the Payne law he is abundantly protected in all his products against foreign competition. Under it and the Dingley law great prosperity has come to him. If he is to be stricken down and his interests sacrificed on the combined demand of the selfish consuming public, and unable to defend himself, it can hardly be expected he will be loyal to a party that is chargeable, without right or justice, in bringing such results upon him.

To my mind, if this policy is to be pursued it is but the beginning of the end of the protective system. If one interest is to be sacrificed and stricken down, a disposition certainly will be invited and encouraged to undermine all other interests, which in the end can not be other than disastrous to our whole economic policy. Each should be treated on an equality and each is deserving of a fair and just measure of protection. This rule should be followed in any case, whether it be protective or on a tariff for revenue basis. Every industry should be treated with exact justice under any and all economic systems.

An unrelenting press has been most insistent in an unjust and largely an unwarranted attack upon the tariff act of 1909, for the reason chiefly that print paper was not placed on the free list. I am free to confess many of the farmers sympathized with this warfare and felt many of the rates were unduly high. In many cases in the last election they voted their rebuke to the Republican Party, and the result is clearly discernible in the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, and it is plainly visible in the membership of this body since March 4 last.

Mr. President, I am free to admit many of the rates in the Payne law were placed higher than, in my judgment, the facts warranted. Notwithstanding this fact, however, the farmer alike with every other industry in the country since the passage of the law has met with unusual prosperity. Farm prices have largely maintained their level until recently, agricultural lands have appreciated in value, labor has found ready employment at higher rates of wages than ever before, the commercial and industrial activities of the country were not impeded, but on the contrary the fullest measure of prosperity has prevailed. The law converted a deficiency in the revenues in its first year to a handsome surplus.

If this agreement is to be ratified and enacted into law, I have confidence the agricultural population of our country will have a higher and juster appreciation of the law and of the protection afforded them under the act of 1909 than they have heretofore manifested.

"The high cost of living" is the battle cry of all the interests favoring the ratification and enactment of the proposed measure. If the claim be true, it must necessarily follow the removal of the duties upon the products of the farm and opening the door to Canadian competition must lower the price with the hope that the ultimate consumer will be the beneficiary. If he is to profit, it necessarily must be at the expense of the farmer. The prices of agricultural products and of live stock will be reduced as a result.

The profits of the farm under present conditions are not unduly remunerative. Land values are high, equipment is purchased in a protected market, farm labor is scarce and almost prohibitive in many localities as to rate of wages, and as a result the farmer's profits are much less than on an equal investment along other lines of industry.

The serious and admitted difficulty in the way of the ultimate consumer is the cost of distribution. The fault lies in there being too many consumers and not a sufficient number of producers. Too many, and far too many, are engaged in domestic or retail distribution to the consumer who in the end is obliged to pay the added cost. Even if there were as a result of this agreement a lessened cost of the products of the farm, little or no benefit would accrue to the ultimate consumer for the reason the depreciation in price originally would be appropriated by the middlemen before the product reached its final destination.

The census of 1910 tells its own story. The population of the agricultural area in many sections of our country, even in the most productive regions, shows a less population than 10 years ago. The segregation and the increase have centered in the larger cities, where rates of wages are higher and where it is felt greater opportunities lie in individual effort. This should not be so. Within the last decade rural life, with its opportunities, has been made much more attractive and agreeable. The improvements in agricultural machinery have made farm work much easier and less a drudgery. Rural free delivery extends throughout every rural community where the density of population at all justifies it. The rural telephone is accessible to practically every farm home. It brings the farmer into immediate touch with his own community and his business and commercial center. The automobile in modern rural life, with its rapidity of communication, is not an exception. Improved highways have added to the accessibility of rural districts and with their commercial and industrial centers. In every way farm life has been modernized, improved, made more attractive, and it is where the highest ideals of citizenship are nurtured and upon which the stability and security of our institutions largely rest.

Mr. President, to my mind these things have largely been made possible by modern development under the stimulus and encouragement of the Republican policy of protection. In my judgment there might be a modification under the existing tariff law when the exact facts are obtainable, but to enact the proposed measure is a revulsion of existing conditions which will retard, if not crush out, the prosperity and development of farm life and in every way defeat the upbuilding and advancement of our rural communities.

The arable lands of the Nation are practically occupied. Much can be done in rejuvenating a large part of the farm lands of the East. Greater care and better farming should be followed in the newer communities. We, however, can increase our acreage and productiveness somewhat through irrigation, which has taken such splendid form under the Federal Government. Much can be done by intensive and also by dry farming in the semiarid regions. Congress has recognized this fact by recent legislation in enlarging the area of this class of lands under the homestead law.

Under such conditions and the legitimate and ordinary and natural increase in the value of farm products, is it not fair and just the farmer should profit thereby and this condition should have relation under the existing economic policy of the Government to the area of lands within our own boundaries and the citizenship which occupies it and produces therefrom?

The proposition now is to throw open the vast area of the Canadian northwest, which is as yet largely undeveloped and with possibilities almost beyond computation in the production of the cereals, and to open our market to strangers and foreigners which can have no other result than to depreciate and lessen the price of all products and live stock raised on the American farm.

The area of northwestern Canada, as well as the productiveness, is almost limitless. The Provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta embrace practically 370,000,000 acres, with a tillable area of 214,000,000. The area of these Provinces is nearly equal to the great States of Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Idaho, Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, the imperial granary of our own great Northwest. I insert a table heretofore used in this discussion showing the respective areas in the different Provinces and States above named:

Area of Provinces and States.

Provinces and States.	Number of acres.	Number of acres of tillable land.	Number of square miles.

The possibilities of the development of these Provinces are enormous and can not well be comprehended. The lands are much less in value than on this side of the border. A much less investment is required in production, and even if the rate of wages does not greatly differ the American farmer would have an unequal task in competition against such tremendous odds.

Mr. President, I will not review in detail all of the articles affected by the proposed agreement. I take occasion to mention a few. Under the Dingley law the production of flax, protected by a duty of 25 cents per bushel, was greatly stimulated. The farmers, especially in the Northwest, largely increased the acreage, and the production rapidly developed. In the year 1898, succeeding the passage of the Dingley law, the production of flax in the United States aggregated 12,500,000 bushels, with an average price of 95 cents per bushel and a total valuation of $11,237,000. Ten years later, or during the year 1908, the production of flax had increased to 28,500,000 bushels, with an average price of $1.18 and a total farm value of $30,577,000. The crop for 1910 was very short and the production was 14,116,000 bushels, with a farm value per bushel of $2.30 and a total farm value of $32,554,000. I submit the following table, which clearly demonstrates that the American farmer, and especially in the Northwest, secures the advantage of the tariff thereon over his Canadian rival.

The places are immediately adjacent along the international boundary line, and the prices given are in themselves sufficiently eloquent in their demonstration of the fact without the necessity of elaboration or further comment. It makes clear the American farmer is protected by the rate of duty levied under the different laws in force.

Mr. President, as further showing the yield per acre as well as the farm price per bushel of the flax crop for the year 1910 in the States and Provinces named, I submit the following which I have compiled from the recent report of the Tariff Board. It shows the average yield per acre in Canada more than 2½ bushels over that in the States named, but the price per bushel in these States is 30 cents over that in Canada.

United States.	Yield per acre.	Farm price per bushel.	Canada.	Yield per acre.	Farm price per bushel.

The total production of flax during the year 1910, as shown by the Department of Agriculture, as hereinbefore stated, was 14,116,000 bushels, with a farm value of $32,554,000. The following States, in the year 1910, produced nearly 90 per cent of the flax crop of the United States:

States.	Bushels.	Farm value.
North Dakota	5,778,000	$13,578,000
Minnesota	3,540,000	8,142,000
South Dakota	3,300,000	7,557,000
Total	12,618,000	29,277,000

The foregoing very clearly demonstrates the great interest the people of the above-named States have in the pending measure in its effect on this single crop.

The production of barley in the United States in 1898, the year succeeding the enactment of the Dingley law, was 60,000,000 bushels, with a farm value of $37,000,000. The production for the year 1910 was 162,227,000 bushels, with a farm value of $93,785,000. The following Northwestern States, as shown by the report of the Agricultural Department, produced upward of 50 per cent of the barley crop of the United States:

States.	Bushels.	Farm value.
Minnesota	26,985,000	$16,191,000
Wisconsin	22,429,000	14,355,000
South Dakota	18,655,000	10,633,000

North Dakota	5,428,000	2,935,000
Total	88,542,000	52,589,000

That the farmers of the Northwestern States were effectively protected from Canadian competition in the importation of this crop, I submit the following comparative table of current prices on the dates named in the United States and in Canada at adjacent points near the boundary line. The duty on this product saved the market to the Northwestern farmer, and the advantage this gave him was his security and protection.

Difference, 24 to 29 cents.

Mr. President, in further demonstration of the fact that the existing rate of duty on barley does protect the northwestern farmer on this grain I submit additional data which I have compiled as to yield per acre of this crop for the year 1910 from the report of the Tariff Board and the farm prices therefor in the following-named States and Provinces. This discloses the fact that the average price per bushel on this side of the line is practically 20 cents over that on the other side of the international boundary line, but the Canadian farmer has an advantage of an average yield per acre of 13 bushels:

United States.	Average yield per acre.	Farm price per bushel.	Canada.	Average yield per acre.	Farm price per bushel.

The total production of spring wheat for the year 1910, as shown by the Department of Agriculture, was 231,399,000 bushels, with a farm value of $207,868,000. The following States produced practically 75 per cent of the spring-wheat crop during the preceding year, as shown by the following table:

States.	Bushels.	Farm value.
Minnesota	94,080,000	$88,435,000
South Dakota	46,720,000	41,581,000
North Dakota	36,105,000	32,494,000
Total	176,905,000	163,510,000

The people of the foregoing States naturally and necessarily have a tremendous interest in the provisions of the pending measure. Its enactment is fraught, they believe, with great consequence to their present and future welfare. The present law saves them from competition with their Canadian rivals and protects them in their home market.

If the present rate of duty is removed, as is proposed, their present market will be overwhelmed and the price reduced to the Canadian level. Under existing conditions and the rate of duty now in force the American farmer has the advantage and receives a higher price for his products, as shown by the following table, giving current prices for wheat on either side of the border:

As further showing the difference in the price of wheat and the advantage to the American farmer in the rate of duty over that of the Canadian producer, I submit the following table, submitted by the Tariff Board in its report to the President on February 28, 1911, showing the Minneapolis and Winnipeg prices, and advance of the Minneapolis prices over Winnipeg prices during each month of the year of 1910. It shows a difference in the price per bushel in favor of Minneapolis over Winnipeg from 6½ cents to 15⅝ cents throughout the year. It occurs to me the American farmer should not be called upon to surrender this advantage he now has to satisfy the selfish demand and what seems to be an unreasonable hope of the public, and from which no reduction in the end will be realized by the ultimate consumer.

The farmers of the Northwest, under the fostering care of the Dingley and Payne laws, were induced to engage especially in the production of flax and barley, and great interests looking to the manufacture of products from them have located near the sources of production; and instead of the prices being fixed by the eastern or the European markets, they have been dictated largely at Chicago, Milwaukee, and at Minneapolis. That they have been protected in their industry and in these productions is clearly demonstrated by the prices this side of the border as compared with those on the other side of the line, as is shown by the foregoing quotations.

The advantage under protection as it relates to each product is with the American farmer.

Substantially the same conditions exist as to the oat crop as to that of wheat, barley, and flax. It is not my purpose to detain the Senate by a discussion thereon or to encumber the RECORD by elaboration. The argument that applies to one largely has equal force to the other. The oat crop for the year 1910 aggregated 1,096,396,000 bushels. It represented a value of upward of $380,000,000. The North Central States produced 80 per cent of this great crop. The producers of the great bulk of this crop in the United States, as a rule, are in immediate and close competition geographically with their Canadian rivals.

Mr. President, I have called attention to the production of spring wheat, especially in the northwestern area embraced within the States of Minnesota, North and South Dakota, where substantially 75 per cent of this crop is produced annually. Notwithstanding the fact that these three States, with an area of upward of 230,000 square miles, produce such an abundant supply of this cereal, it is insignificant in comparison with the larger and more extensive area of northwestern Canada. The area embraced in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta alone comprises 577,600 square miles. This vast acreage, mostly of highly productive land, is two and one-half times the area of the States last named.

The average yield per acre of wheat in the States named during the year 1910 was as follows: Minnesota, 16 bushels; South Dakota, 14 bushels; and North Dakota, 13 bushels; while Saskatchewan was 22 bushels per acre. With such a tremendous area open to the cultivation of wheat and only 10 or 12 per cent of the lands now under cultivation, what will be the result in a few years with the possibility of the future development of this extended area?

There has been an enormous and marvelous increase in recent years in the production of spring wheat in the region immediately north of the States which produce the great bulk of the spring-wheat crop, and, as heretofore stated, with the advantage all in favor of the Canadian producer, with the cheaper lands and greater production per acre, the volume of its production will be wonderfully accelerated and in the end will overwhelm the producers of this great crop in the United States.

I need not amplify, as far as the argument is concerned, in relation to the production of wheat and to competition with the American producer, nor need I add further to the suggestions heretofore made in regard to the competition as to flax, oats, and barley. The argument as it applies to the wheat crop is equally true as to barley, oats, and flax.

Mr. President, it seems to me, should this proposal be consummated, the menace of competition and depreciation in the price of the products in question to the American farmer, and especially to those of the Northwest, is definite and certain. The area susceptible of the profitable cultivation of the cereals and of flax is so extensive and vast in northwestern Canada, it occurs to me, no other result can be reached. Its extent is disclosed by the table I have already used. The area in crops in the year 1909 was less than 12,000,000 acres. Yet with this limited acreage they produced 147,482,000 bushels of wheat, at an average yield per acre of nearly 22 bushels, while the average yield in the United States was about 15½ bushels.

The Canadian Yearbook for 1909 further states that the total production of crops in northwestern Canada for that year was 240,000,000 bushels. The area capable of producing grain, from the same authority, is stated to be 220,000,000 acres and that the unoccupied land in the future will at least produce 5,000,000,000 bushels annually, and this without taking into consideration the Mackenzie Basin, which is also capable of producing grain. With such an annual production and with such a limited area now under cultivation, it is but a simple proposition in mathematics to determine what the result will be in a very limited number of years, when even only a small part of this vast area is made productive through cultivation. I have seen it stated that in recent years more than one and a half millions of acres annually of their arable lands are broken, and that during the present year it is estimated that at least that acreage of new lands will be opened and ready for crop the next year. This, in my judgment, is a very low estimate. This development would be accelerated under normal conditions.

In my judgment, should the proposal now made be enacted, it would immeasurably hasten the development, increase its production, and to that extent add to and intensify the competition with the American farmer and depress his market.

Mr. President, it is most vigorously contended, and from high sources, that the Liverpool market fixes the price of wheat as well as of all our grains; that this being so, the proposed modification and the removal of the existing duties would not affect the price of wheat to the American farmer. The wheat production in the United States in the year 1909 was 664,802,000 bushels. Of that amount we consumed practically 90 per cent, and only 10 per cent was for export. The great bulk of the crop that is now produced is paid for in the American market, and the amount for export each year will undoubtedly be a diminishing quantity.

I submit the following table, taken from the report of the Tariff Board, submitted to Congress on March 1 of the present year, showing quarterly prices of wheat in Liverpool, in Winnipeg, and other markets in the United States for 1909–10:

	1909				1910
	Jan.	Apr.	July.	Oct.	Jan.	Apr.	July.	Oct.
Minneapolis, No. 1 northern	$1.07⅞	$1.26⅜	$1.31⅜	$1.03⅞	$1.15½	$1.11½	$1.25½	$1.07⅜
Duluth, No. 1 northern	1.06½	1.25½	1.30⅜	1.03⅜	1.14½	1.11⅜	1.28⅛	1.07¼
Chicago, No. 1 northern	1.08¼	1.26⅜	1.30	1.05	1.16½	1.16	1.25	1.12
Winnipeg, No. 1 northern	.99¾	1.23¾	1.30	.99⅜	1.04	1.03½	1.17⅜	.98¼
Liverpool, No. 2 northern (Manitoba)	1.16	1.37	1.43	1.31	1.22	1.18	1.18	1.16

It will be observed the range of prices varies somewhat, but with uniformity the price at Minneapolis and Duluth during the two years covered by the table is higher than at Winnipeg, in some cases the difference ranging as high as 10½ and 11½ cents per bushel, and in no case lower than 1⅝ cents. If the price of wheat at Minneapolis and Duluth is fixed by the price at Liverpool, why, I ask, is there a difference between the price of this cereal at these points and Winnipeg, as above demonstrated, sometimes ranging over 10 cents per bushel, when at the same time the freight rate on wheat from Winnipeg is less to Liverpool than from Minneapolis? It occurs to me from the evidence thus adduced by the Tariff Board it is incumbent from some authentic source to make explanation. The facts, however, clearly establish the truth of the statement, and in my opinion any other position is untenable.

The senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in his very able report to the Senate on this bill, shows that in order to export wheat from Minneapolis to Liverpool the price at the latter place would have to be at least 16 to 17 cents per bushel higher than at Minneapolis in order to pay the freight rates, insurance, commissions, handling, and so forth, and allowing a reasonable profit on capital and risk of business. It is further shown that the average prices of No. 1 northern in Minneapolis and Liverpool for the years 1908, 1909, and 1910, as reported by the Bureau of Statistics, were as follows:

Years.	Minneapolis.	Liverpool.	Difference.
1908	$1.11	$1.25	$0.14
1909	1.20	1.29	.09
1910	1.14	1.14	None.

If therefore the Liverpool market had fixed the price at Minneapolis, and computing the difference at 17 cents per bushel, the price at Minneapolis would have been 3 cents lower in 1908, 8 cents lower in 1909, and 17 cents lower in 1910. The loss on the wheat crop of Minnesota and North and South Dakota for the three years would have been as follows:

Years.	Total crop.	Loss per bushel.	Total loss.
	Bushels.	Cents.
1908	174,847,000	3	$5,245,410
1909	232,430,000	8	18,594,400
1910	177,905,000	17	30,243,850
Total loss of 3 States for 3 years			54,083,660

Under present conditions the farmers of the Northwest, even with the existing rates of duty against Canadian importations, have no undue advantage over their Canadian competitors. Their lands in the United States are of greater value. The productive capacity of the soil is less in wheat, barley, flax, and oats. The quality of each is inferior to that produced by the Canadian farmer. By reason of the greater production per acre of these crops in Canada the average cost of the production of a bushel of grain is very much lessened, and this all to the advantage of those across the international boundary line.

If this is not true, why has there each year been such a large emigration from many of the Northwestern States to Canada? Few of these people return, and they appear satisfied with conditions and the opportunities there afforded them. It has been asserted by high officials of the Canadian Government that already 500,000 Americans have transferred their allegiance to Canada, and with their energy and industry and means are now contributing to the development and upbuilding of Canada.

This already has been a serious loss in wealth and to the industrial strength and producing capacity of many sections of our country. Shall we, by legislation of the character proposed, increase and encourage that movement, and by force of changed conditions, which must surely follow, drive our own people from the fields they now occupy to the more promising and hopeful opportunities under a foreign flag? The sole remedy, it occurs to me, is to maintain the present tariff rates, and under improved industrial and economic conditions an equitable balance will be secured and maintained.

Mr. President, the interests to be materially and substantially affected by the provisions of the pending measure are extensive and immense, and it should receive the most careful and painstaking consideration before the agriculturists with all their interests should be so materially affected. The data as to agriculture as it will be shown by the census of 1910 are largely not obtainable, and we are obliged to look to the information given us by the census of 1900. That year the value of farm lands, including buildings, farm implements, and machinery, and live stock, aggregated $20,439,000,000.

This aggregate must have tremendously increased during the past decade. It is estimated by Mr. North, the former Director of the Census, as given in the American Yearbook for 1910, that the value of all farm property, as will be shown by the agriculture census for 1910, will be approximately $50,000,000,000. This estimate seems excessive, but it is sufficiently accurate for my purpose.

The number of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits, according to the census of 1900, aggregated upward of 10,381,000. The number so engaged during the last decade has added very materially to the above great total. The value of the annual output, as shown by the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for the year 1909, for farm animals and crop products, aggregated practically $9,000,000,000. With such a large per cent of our population engaged in agricultural pursuits and with such a tremendous investment of capital and with such an aggregate in annual production, it certainly should be sufficient to arrest the attention and demand the earnest consideration of Congress in treating a subject of such vast consequence and affecting such a large percentage of our population, as well as the value of their investments and the price applying to such an enormous production. The capital invested in manufacture, as shown by the returns in 1905, was $12,686,000,000, and the number of persons engaged therein was 5,470,000. The gross value of the manufactured products for that year was $14,802,000,000. If, however, the cost of materials used, and of fuel, freight, and so forth, were deducted, it would leave a net value of the product of $9,821,000,000.

In the measure before us it occurs to me it has relations to and affects most materially the farmer and the value of his products, which, in comparison, as far as the amount of the investment is considered and the number of individuals engaged therein, are far in excess of the capital invested in manufacture and the wage earners employed, while the net value of the annual product of the two industries is substantially the same. The measure retains protection to the latter and guards the manufacturer practically in all his rights, while at the same time it proposes to break down the protective policy to the larger interests of agriculture, placing it upon a free-trade basis and in open competition with strangers and foreigners, while the shield of protection is reserved to the manufacturer with only a limited lowering of certain of the rates. To my mind it is so inequitable and unjust that for my part I can not accede to it.

As a result it will discourage the agricultural producer, depreciate his holdings, lessen his possibilities for success, drive him to the necessity of disposing of his lands, crowd more and more the centers of population, increase the consuming public, and the American farmer will be forced to seek the cheaper lands in the Canadian Dominion, where his chances for success are greater and his opportunities enlarged, and instead of encouraging and protecting our home citizenship it will lead to discouragement and, I fear, to disaster.

To my mind the most serious and substantial objection to the pending measure, as far as it relates to agricultural production, is that it proposes to open our markets to the same class of production that will enter into immediate, direct, and ruinous competition with the identical products of our own people. It is not reciprocal, it is competitive, and will be ruinous to our own producers. The proposal is at variance with the declared principle of reciprocity whenever asserted as a party policy or announced or defined by the older or more recent leaders of the party.

Mr. President, in these observations I have confined myself somewhat to local or sectional conditions in the Northwest. They are apparent, immediate, and striking to the people of that locality. The situation, however, is just as apparent and as imminent in other respects immediately adjacent along the entire international boundary line as affecting the same and other like productions. I trust, however, I am not so narrow or that I am biased by such a selfish or sectional interest that I would not want to do full justice to the people of the whole country irrespective of local or sectional conditions. In the vote I shall cast upon this measure I mean it shall be in the interest of the whole people and for the highest well-being of the present and future of a common country.

Mr. President, in addition to the direct effect on the market price of all the products of the farm, in my judgment history will again repeat itself and it will result in seriously depressing the value of farm lands in the United States should this measure receive the approval of Congress. Before the settlement and development of the great Northwest assumed such stupendous proportions some years since the value of farm lands in the Eastern States, and even in the Ohio Valley, were not unduly high, and agricultural pursuits were profitably carried on.

Great depression, however, soon followed. The eastern farmer could not successfully compete with his western rival. The western lands were rich, wonderfully productive, and easy of tillage. Freight rates were reduced, and the western farmer could deliver his products in the eastern market at less cost and at greater profit than the eastern producer. The latter was obliged to meet adverse conditions. The soil had long been tilled and was exhausted in many cases. It required fertilizing and greater care and labor in production. The investment was higher and the cost of production much in excess of his western competitor.

Government statistics disclose the fact that in the States of New England and New York alone over 7,000,000 acres of agricultural lands were abandoned between the years 1880 and 1900. They also disclose the further fact that these States, including the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, lost in the value of their farm lands and buildings between the years 1880 and 1900 the enormous aggregate of $427,000,000. Substantially like conditions manifested themselves during the same period in other Eastern and older States.

But, Mr. President, during the last decade a wonderful change has come. The Eastern States have more than regained what they had lost during the opening and development of the newer West. As shown by the returns of the last census, the New England States, with New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, gained in the value of farm lands and buildings from 1900 to 1910 the vast sum of $1,232,000,000. The country as a whole during the last 10 years makes a marvelous showing as to the increase in the value of farm lands and buildings. The increase has been upward of 100 per cent. The total value of farm lands, including buildings, as shown by the census of 1900, was $16,675,000,000, while the returns so far made for the census of 1910 would indicate the aggregate would reach the stupendous sum of $34,000,000,000. Although the eastern farmer during the time mentioned felt keenly the depreciation of his holdings and the great loss that came to him, he could at least console himself with the thought that the burdens he bore were incident to the development of the area within our own territorial limits, and the benefits that accrued were added to the wealth of our own citizenship under favored conditions.

With tariff restrictions removed, the area to be opened in the Canadian northwest is greater, and its productive capacity in the cereals far exceeds that of the lands opened in our own western domain a generation since, that so greatly lowered the value of the farms of the East and of the Middle West, made the industry unprofitable, and resulted in the abandonment of millions of acres of farm lands.

Should this measure be enacted, in my judgment no other result can follow and history will repeat itself. The loss, however, will not fall this time alone upon the agriculturist of the East and of the Middle West as heretofore, but its blighting and depressing effect will more concern the farmer adjacent to the international boundary line, and especially those of the Northwest. Are the agriculturists called upon to again meet such a condition, suffer such great loss, and struggle through such an experience, not as a result of conditions within our own borders or for our own citizenship, but for another Government and for aliens under a foreign flag?

Mr. President, the States which are more directly in competition with the Canadian northwest, in the productions to which I have referred, are Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota. The average value per acre of improved land in these States, as shown by the census of 1910, is almost double that of the average value of the lands in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. I submit the following table of the value per acre of improved land in the Canadian Provinces, as given in the report of the Tariff Board. The value in the States named is from the last census:

Average value per acre of improved land in 1910.

United States.	Price per acre.	Canada.	Price per acre.
Wisconsin	$57.00	Manitoba	$29.00
Minnesota	46.00	Saskatchewan	22.00
North Dakota	28.95	Alberta	20.00
South Dakota	38.67

There has been marvelous development and prosperity in my own State during the last decade. Each year during the past fourteen there has been contributed in the production of new wealth the largest percentage per capita of any State in the Union.

As shown by the census of 1900, the total value of farm land and buildings in the State of South Dakota was $220,133,000. Last year the census returns disclosed the value to be $1,003,451,000, an increase of 356 per cent. The average value per acre of farm land and buildings in 1900 was $11.54; in 1910 it had grown to $38.67, an increase of 235 per cent.

Independent of the effect the proposed measure will have on the prices of all products of the farm or of farm values, the people of my State have also a great interest in the proposed elimination of duties on the importation of live stock, in which they feel they will be injuriously and seriously affected in case of the ratification of the measure in question. I quote from the Crop Reporter, published by the Department of Agriculture, for February, 1910, giving the estimated number, average price, and total value of farm animals in South Dakota on January 1, 1910:

	Number.	Value.
Horses	612,000	$64,260,000
Mules	10,000	1,210,000
Milch cows	656,000	21,648,000
Other cattle	1,341,000	28,832,000
Sheep	829,000	3,316,000
Swine	805,000	8,963,000
Total	4,253,000	128,229,000

It will be observed from the foregoing table that the farmers of South Dakota have a large and increasing interest in this measure, which, they feel, will injuriously affect the value of all farm animals.

I will not take the time of the Senate to discuss at length the separate classes and items independent of what I have heretofore presented. In my judgment, the bill is a grievous and unwarranted assault upon every interest of agriculture, and opens the vast field of the Canadian northwest to direct and immediate competition with all productions of the farm, including live stock. It is in no sense reciprocal, nor does it propose an exchange in noncompeting products, but on the contrary it puts the farmers of the United States in open competition with the Canadian producer with substantially the same character of productions.

As I have heretofore stated, it is giving an advantage to the manufacturing interests of the United States, and the agriculturists are to be sacrificed in order to secure that advantage. It will be a benefit especially to the manufacturers of agricultural implements, to the great packing interests, to the great railway companies, especially along our northern borders; but in order to serve these interests and that large profits should come to them, is it either just or equitable that all of the agricultural interests should be imperiled, their profits reduced, and the value of their holdings lessened? The foundation of all prosperity lies in agriculture, and if its interests are to be jeopardized and the profits of the farm and the farmer are to be sacrificed, their loss and their discouragement will enter every avenue of industry, of commerce, of manufacture, as well as of transportation, and general depression, which will affect every commercial and industrial interest, must be the ultimate result.

Mr. President, the wheat produced by the farmer is placed upon the free list, but the great milling interest is protected by a duty on flour, bran, mill feed, and middlings, and in which the agriculturist has no advantage.

The producers of barley are shorn of their protection, but the malsters and the brewers are to suffer no loss, while barley malt retains a duty of 45 cents per 100 pounds.

While the farmer on this side of the line may raise flax, which has been protected by a duty of 25 cents per bushel, this measure removes that duty, but retains a duty of 15 cents per gallon on linseed oil produced therefrom for the benefit of the great oil mills of the country.

It is proposed that the American farmer shall meet free competition in the raising of his horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs, while the packers are still protected in a duty on dressed meats.

The farmer is to meet free competition in all his products, but in the things he has to buy they are to be purchased in a protected market. The farmer is to be sacrificed, and he is to bear the burden for the advantages that are to come to the millers, the maltsters, the packers, the publishers, the manufacturers, and the railway lines adjacent to the international boundary; and all this, Mr. President, to be accomplished under what seems to me the assumed and false assertion of the reduction of "the high cost of living," which in the end will not be realized by the ultimate consumer.

Mr. President, for my part I shall assume no such responsibility. I believe in giving equal opportunities to all classes of our population, and each should bear equally the burdens which necessarily flow from any economic system in our governmental life. The measure proposed is inequitable, unfair, unjust, is in the clearest sense class legislation, which should not be tolerated. It follows no known or recognized rule in our legislative history as far as tariff legislation is concerned, and, in my judgment, will not promote the end sought, but, on the contrary, will bring depression, discouragement, and great loss to a large class of our population, which, instead of being sacrificed by the enactment of this proposal, should receive the sympathy, the encouragement, and by legislation maintain them in their well-earned and strong position which, under adverse conditions, their energy, their industry, and their patriotism have wrought out.

Mr. President, as it has relation to what I have heretofore stated in connection with the prosperity and development of South Dakota under existing conditions, I ask to submit without reading as a part of my remarks the following extract from a report of the Director of the Census, a summary covering the agricultural productions of South Dakota, compiled from the Thirteenth Decennial Census:

WASHINGTON, June 19.

Statistics relative to the leading crops for the State of South Dakota collected at the Thirteenth Decennial Census, are contained in an official statement issued to-day by Acting Census Director Falkner. It is based on tabular summaries prepared under the direction of Dr. Le Grand Powers, chief statistician for agriculture in the Bureau of the Census. The figures are preliminary and subject to slight revision later, when a few other farms, whose returns, now incomplete, will be included in the final tables. It is not expected that these additions will materially modify the amounts or rates given in the present statement.

The leading crops in 1909, ranked in the order of valuation, were: Wheat, $42,881,000; corn, $26,385,000; oats, $16,038,000; hay and forage, $15,240,000; barley, $10,870,000; flaxseed, $6,993,000; emmer and spelt, $2,626,000; potatoes, $1,967,000.

DECREASE IN WHEAT.

From 3,984,659 acres in 1899 the wheat acreage fell off in 1909 to 3,104,622 acres, a decrease of 22.1 per cent. The preceding census showed an increase; the acreage being, in 1889, 2,259,846 acres. Although wheat decreased in acreage during the past decade, the aggregate yield increased for the same period from 41,889,380 bushels in 1899 to 45,289,818 bushels in 1909. The yield of wheat per acre was reported as 15 bushels; the value per acre, $13.80.

CORN MAKES BIG INCREASE.

From 1899 to 1900 the acreage of corn increased from 1,196,381 acres to 1,975,558, or 65.1 per cent. Notwithstanding the enormous gain by oats during the last decade, corn has retained its position among the cereals, ranking second in acreage and first in production. The acreage in 1889 was 753,309. The total yield for 1909 was 53,612,093 bushels, a lead over its nearest competitor in production—wheat—of more than 8,000,000 bushels. The average yield per acre was 27 bushels; the average value per acre, $13.35.

IMMENSE INCREASE IN OATS.

From 1899 to 1909 the acreage in oats increased from 691,167 acres to 1,480,075, or 114.1 per cent. During the past 10 years oats have more than doubled their acreage and are now pressing close upon corn for second place among the cereals. The acreage in 1889 was 580,289 acres. The aggregate yield in 1909 was 41,255,569 bushels; the average yield per acre, 28 bushels; the average value per acre, $10.80.

GREAT GAIN IN HAY AND FORAGE.

The acreage devoted to hay and forage in 1909 was 3,429,527 acres. It has been constantly increasing. With 1,554,913 acres in 1889, it rose to 2,287.875 in 1899, and again to 3,429,527 in 1909. The increase since 1899 has been 49.9 per cent. The acreage in 1889 was 1,554,913 acres. The total yield in 1909 was 3,649,577 tons; the average yield per acre 1.06 tons; and the average value per acre, $4.40.

BARLEY TRIPLES ITS ACREAGE.

From 1899 to 1909 the acreage in barley increased from 299,510 acres to 1,057,533, or 253.1 per cent. Since 1889, when 97,370 acres were harvested, this crop has multiplied more than tenfold. The increase in the decade, from 1889 to 1899, was notable, but that for the past 10 years has been even more remarkable. The total yield in 1909 was 20,325,498 bushels; the average yield per acre, 19 bushels; the average value per acre, $10.25.

FLAXSEED SHOWS INCREASE.

The area devoted to flaxseed in 1909 was 507,286 acres, as compared to 302,010 acres in 1899, an increase of 68 per cent. The acreage in 1889 was 354,951. The total yield in 1909 was 4,649,237 bushels, a gain of over 2,000,000 bushels. The average yield per acre was 9 bushels, and the average value per acre, $13.80.

POTATOES INCREASE.

From 1899 to 1909 potatoes increased in acreage from 33,567 acres to 50,203, or 49.6 per cent. The total yield in 1909 was 3,439,686 bushels; the average yield per acre, 68 bushels; the average value per acre, $39.20.

CROP COMPARISONS.

The cereals had an aggregate acreage of 7,892,482 acres in 1909, as against 6,211,202 acres in 1899, an increase of 1,681,280 acres, or 27 per cent, as compared to an increase for the preceding decade of 67.8 per cent. The average value of cereals per acre in 1909 was $12.50, over twice that of hay and forage. Wheat shows the highest average value per acre of the cereals; buckwheat the lowest. Of the hay and forage crops, alfalfa is well above the rest in average value per acre. There are but a small number of miscellaneous crops, though the average values per acre of several of them are well above those of the more usual crops.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to give notice that on Thursday next, after the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] shall have concluded his address, I intend to make some observations on the Canadian agreement.

The SECRETARY. The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was delivered to the Senate, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me, that I may give a notice?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield for a notice.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Secretary, I give notice that on the 5th of July, during the morning hour, I will address the Senate upon a bill which I propose to introduce upon that day organizing a commission of interstate trade for the regulation of industrial corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator say the 5th or the 6th?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The 5th. We are not to adjourn until the 6th?

Mr. SMOOT. No; we are to adjourn until the 5th; but already there has been a notice given that on July 5 the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] will address the Senate. I suppose the Senator from Nevada means to follow the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be all right. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. THORNTON. I request that the motion be temporarily withdrawn until I can give a notice.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold the motion until the Senator from Louisiana gives a notice.

Mr. THORNTON. I give notice that at the close of the morning business on Friday, the 7th, I shall desire to address the Senate upon the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 12 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being under the previous order of the Senate, until Wednesday, July 5, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 1, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, whose changeless goodness pours itself out upon us in a thousand blessings day by day, receive our sincere thanks, pardon our sins, quicken our conscience, and strengthen us in every good resolution, that we may do the work Thou hast given us to do cheerfully, patiently, faithfully, and efficiently. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

On June 30, 1911:

H. R. 8649. An act to authorize the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW. from Longfellow Street to Sixteenth Street, and of Kennedy Street NW. through lot No. 800, square No. 2718.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I have presented a resolution relating to the administration of public-land laws, and upon that resolution I ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD the reasons for that resolution, so they may go with it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to print a statement in the RECORD.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is it about? I would like to have some information as to what the gentleman desires.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is intended to have the Public Lands Committee investigate the administration of the public-land laws relating to mining claims, homesteads, and the rights over public lands, so that the people may know the present condition of those laws. Under that resolution I have prepared a statement consisting of but little over three pages, showing the reason and necessity for such an investigation, and which simply is intended to bring out the subject of the administration of those laws.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, there was a very distinct understanding, not at the last meeting of the House, but at the meeting before the last, that no business of any kind should be transacted, but that we should simply meet to adjourn until after the Fourth of July. Therefore, I object.

PRINTING OF SPEECHES IN RECORD.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I want to get the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. I desire to make a request for unanimous consent. Of course, if the gentleman thinks it comes within the agreement, I will not insist upon it. I introduced a few days ago a joint resolution touching the printing of speeches and matter connected with them in the RECORD. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, but it occurs to me that under the rules it ought to have gone to the Joint Committee on Printing. So I simply wanted to ask unanimous consent that the reference might be changed. But, as I say, if it comes within the purview of the agreement, of course I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the resolution is properly referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Of course, if there is going to be any contest about it, I shall not insist on it, because I do not want to take up the time of the House now.

Mr. DALZELL. I think the matter might very well go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

PERMANENT MANEUVERING GROUNDS, ETC.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the report of the commission appointed to investigate and report on the advisability of the establishment of permanent maneuvering grounds, camp of inspection, rifle and artillery ranges for troops of the United States at or near the Chickamauga and Chattanooga Military Park, and as to certain lands in the State of Tennessee proposed to be donated to the United States for said purposes, in compliance with the joint resolution of Congress approved February 24, 1911.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, July 5, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

Whereas it is impracticable for the several States bordering upon the Great Lakes and contiguous waters to levy and collect taxes upon the vessels and crafts navigating thereon because of the inability of the several States to enact uniform laws respecting the taxation of such crafts and vessels; and

Whereas the great majority of such vessels and crafts practically escape taxation by any jurisdiction; and

Whereas it has thus far been the policy of the Federal Government to leave the inner harbor improvements to the several States or local political units: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to enact a law or laws regulating commerce on the Great Lakes and contiguous waters, and imposing a suitable license, registration, or other fee on vessels and other crafts engaged in commerce on said waters, the same being commonly designated by the Federal Government as the northwestern waters, together with all contiguous lakes, rivers, sounds, and bayous, and that the Federal Government improve the inner harbors of the several ports of entry on said waters with the proceeds of said fees: Be it further

PAPER ON NORTH AMERICAN TRADE, BY STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS (S. DOC. NO. 61).

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to a pamphlet publication of several pages, entitled "An American Continental Commercial Union or Alliance." The author is Stephen A. Douglas, many years a distinguished Member of the Senate and long a commanding figure in the politics and public life of the country. Mr. Douglas prepared this article in 1861, shortly before his death. It was left among his unpublished writings. The first publication of the article was made by J. Madison Cutts, brother-in-law and literary executor of Mr. Douglas, in 1889. On inquiry I find that no copies of this publication are available, save the two in the Library of Congress. At the time of its preparation the Elgin-Marcy treaty of reciprocity with Canada had been in operation over six years. A portion of the article is devoted to comment on and criticism of that treaty, and all of it to an illuminating discussion of the subject of annexation of trade on the North American Continent without annexation of territory or extension of political connections. The subject is presented in the usual comprehensive, concise, and masterful style of Mr. Douglas. The subject and the author's treatment of it are quite pertinent to the subject matter of the unfinished business now before the Senate. In my judgment, the article would prove an interesting and instructive contribution to the literature of this debate. I ask unanimous consent that this article, together with a few brief explanatory headlines, taken from the preface, by J. Madison Cutts, may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

The said commission may at any time, upon complaint of any person, corporation, or body, or upon its own initiative, revoke and cancel the registration of any corporation registered under this act, upon the ground of either violation of any operative judicial decree rendered under an act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890, or under sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 27, 1894, or upon ground of materially improper financial organization and security issue, occurring either before or after registration, affecting the interests of the public or of any large class thereof, or of the use of materially unfair or oppressive methods of competition, or of the violation of the laws of the United States prohibiting the acceptance of discriminations, rebates, and concessions from the lawful tariff rates of common carriers, or of such other material improper business transactions as may from time to time be prohibited by regulations made in pursuance of this act by said commission, or on the ground of refusal or neglect to allow the commission access to its records or papers as provided in section 8 hereof. Whenever it shall appear that any corporation subject to the provisions of this act is materially overcapitalized, the commission may, as a condition of continued registration, require such corporation so to readjust its securities or assets as to correct such overcapitalization. The said commission in considering revocation of registration under this section shall give such notice and have power to take such evidence and hold such hearings as may be prescribed by the regulations issued under this act.

SEC. 11. That in case of revocation of the registration of any corporation the commission may also order that such corporation thereafter shall not engage in interstate commerce. For every day's continuance in such commerce contrary to such order such corporation shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000, and the said commission shall have power to apply to any circuit court of the United States for an injunction enforcing the provisions of this section and any order issued thereunder.

SEC. 12. That the said commission may at any time, upon application by a corporation whose registration has been previously canceled, reinstate said corporation for registration and grant it registration anew: Provided, That the said commission is satisfied that the cause or causes for which registration was revoked no longer exist and that the commission shall find that all the requirements for registration as set forth in section 4 shall have been complied with anew as of the date of the new application for registration.

SEC. 13. The said commission may at any time, if in the opinion of the commission public necessity requires such action, order and require any corporation engaged in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, except corporations subject to the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, but including pipe-line companies, to make such statements and give such information as is prescribed in sections 4 and 8 of this act, which information shall be published in accordance with the provisions of section 9 hereof. The commission may also obtain from any such corporation, through the powers granted in section 14 hereof, such information as shall enable said commission to determine whether such corporation is subject to the terms of this act.

SEC. 14. In order to accomplish the purposes declared in sections 8 and 13 of this act, the said commission shall have and exercise the same power and authority in respect to corporations subject to this act as is conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission in said act to regulate commerce and the amendment thereto in respect to common carriers, so far as the same may be applicable, including the right to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence and to administer oaths. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said act to regulate commerce and by an act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, etc., approved February 11, 1893, supplementary to said act to regulate commerce, and the act defining immunity, approved June 30, 1906, shall also apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence in pursuance of the authority conferred by sections 8 and 13 hereof.

SEC. 15. That the said commission shall, on or before the day of in each year, make a report, which shall be transmitted to Congress. This report shall contain such information and data collected by the commission as it may deem of value in the determination of questions connected with the regulation of commerce, together with such recommendations as to additional legislation relating thereto as the commission may deem necessary.

SEC. 16. That any corporation engaged in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, without regard to the amount of its gross annual receipts, may also, by complying and continuing to comply with the terms of sections 4, 8, and 9 hereof, acquire and maintain United States registration as provided in sections 5 and 6, subject to the provision for cancellation thereof prescribed in section 10; and the information furnished by such corporation shall be subject to the provisions of section 9.

SEC. 17. That the said commission shall have power to make any and all regulations necessary and proper to carry out the purposes of this act, and at any time to alter, amend, or repeal the same or any part thereof.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust decisions, with the recent report on the steel industry, demonstrate what I have contended for many years—that there is need of an independent, quasi judicial, and administrative tribunal of great character and dignity, as far removed from partisan control as are the courts, for the continuous control of the big industrial corporations engaged in interstate trade. Had such legislation been secured in place or in aid of the Sherman Act over 20 years ago, we would have advanced as far in the regulation of industrial corporations as we have in that of railroads. The recent expressions of Mr. Gary and others indicate that even the great corporate managers recognize that public regulation is now inevitable.

The bill which I have introduced provides for an interstate trade commission of five members, which shall control industrial corporations as the Interstate Commerce Commission does the railroads. The Bureau of Corporations, which has for a number of years been investigating industrial corporations and which has a most competent force of over 100 men, is by this bill separated from the Department of Commerce and Labor and merged in the commission of interstate trade. The Commissioner of Corporations is made a member of the new commission.

The bill requires that all industrial corporations engaged in interstate trade whose annual receipts exceed $5,000,000 shall make satisfactory statements as to capitalization, finances, and operations as may be required by the commission. Such corporations are to be known as United States registered companies. The distinction of being thus registered will be sought by all such companies, and to lack it will be regarded as an indication that there is something wrong. Frequent reports will be required from all such corporations, and the information of public interest will be published from time to time.

The commission may at any time cancel the registration of any registered corporation for improper financial organization, oppressive or unfair methods of competition, acceptance of railway rebates, refusal to allow access to records, or noncompliance with any judicial decree rendered under the Sherman Act. It may also, in extreme cases, for such offenses, debar such corporation from engaging in interstate commerce. The commission may also, as a condition of continued registration, require material overcapitalization to be corrected.

I was at first inclined, following the views which I have frequently expressed, to include a provision transferring the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act from the Attorney General's office to this commission, for the reason that prior to the administration of the present incumbent the enforcement of the Sherman Act was fitful, subject to political influences, and likely to be affected by any political or financial exigency. But as the Attorney General's office is now proceeding, to the satisfaction of the country, to break up the existing trusts, I thought it best not to complicate the work of the new commission with the administration of the Sherman Act.

The commission will be nonpartisan, with not more than three members of one party. The term of office will be 10 years. The commission should be free from Executive control and political exigencies.

I have not thought it best at the start to give the commission too many powers of correction or of punishment, nor does the bill give the power of fixing prices. The purpose of the bill is to maintain and preserve the opportunity for fair competition and not to recognize monopolies in trade or regulate their prices. The powers of the commission may be later enlarged as experience shall indicate.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has large powers and now employs about 600 men. It has won the entire confidence of the country. It has become strong and efficient through a process of evolution. It is fortunate that in creating the new commission we can avail ourselves of the Bureau of Corporations as the nucleus of the organization, that bureau having also passed through an evolutionary process which will be a source of strength and efficiency.

I request that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER (ALA.) IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama.

Mr. President, in offering this amendment and requesting that it be printed and laid on the table, I desire to state very briefly what it is, so that Senators may be fully advised of the purposes of the amendment and the proposed changes.

The amendment eliminates from the bill every feature which met objection when the bill was under consideration a few days ago. Instead of the payment of a royalty for the use of the surplus water, this amendment provides that the power company shall erect a storage dam, under plans approved by the Secretary of War, and acquire title to and convey the same to the United States to all lands that will be submerged by the higher dam provided for at Lock 17.

The cost of the storage dam and acquiring title to the submerged lands is estimated at over $1,500,000, and I am satisfied that the proposed amendment will save the Government money over the present project. I do not propose to ask present consideration, as I desire the Senate to have an opportunity to fully understand it before the bill is taken up.

The Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. was formed for the purpose of developing water power and aiding navigation on the Warrior River. It has a charter from the State of Alabama, and is a riparian power company on the Warrior River under the law of Alabama, and no other power company can condemn or interfere with its rights upon the stretch of river set out in its charter to be improved—that is, from Lock and Dam 16, 30 or 40 miles up the river, above Mulberry and Sipsey Fork, making in all a stretch of river being improved and controlled for water-power purposes of at least 75 to 80 miles.

To show that they intend to meet the Government halfway the company have agreed to furnish and buy up the lands that would be flooded by building Dam 17 63 feet high and donate the same to the United States Government, which, if it had to be provided by the Government, would cost a considerable sum of money.

This company has also in this bill agreed to build a dam at the head of navigation, or, in other words, at the head of the stretch of river to be improved by this higher dam, at a cost of $1,500,000, for the purpose of storing water to operate successfully through the dry seasons of the year and thereby controlling the flood stages of the river during high-water seasons, thus aiding the navigation of the river by controlling these floods that usually come in the spring of the year, which will make navigation a much more feasible proposition.

The rise and fall of the Warrior River is over 43 feet, and at low water navigation in the dry season by existing locks is not entirely satisfactory. The impounding dam, 100 feet high, will correct this and furnish easy navigation.

This company has the indorsement of the commercial bodies of the Birmingham district and also of Mobile. If this improvement was carried on under the existing system in vogue on the Warrior River, of building one lock in order to get the material up to build another, it would take 10 or 12 years to complete navigation on the Warrior River, but by concentrating all the forces of development at Lock 17, with the railroad and equipment nearly completed on the ground for building same, the navigation project can be hastened or completed in a year and a half, or at the outside two years. This mode of development also extends navigation up Valley Creek, or Valley River, in the direction of Birmingham and the city of Bessemer 11 miles, a river the Government has had surveys made of for the purpose of improving same for navigation, bringing it in easy reach of Birmingham and Bessemer with the assistance of three more dams. It also eliminates five or six locks of the old style, from 5 to 10 feet high, on this river.

The object of the bill is to entirely complete navigation of the Warrior River in the State of Alabama by increasing the height of Dam 17 from 21 feet to 63 feet, thereby eliminating four locks and dams that were included in the original plan of improving the said river, with a saving on the cost of the improvement to the Government as proposed by the bill, and saving to the citizens and coal producers of Alabama about one-half of the present cost of transportation, and an added improvement which follows a developed river.

The Board of Engineers say in their report:

> The board considers this plan for power development to be the most favorable one that has been proposed and to be very desirable of accomplishment if it is found to be practicable to carry it out in such a manner as to reduce the ultimate cost to the United States of the improvement in the interests of navigation.

And the Acting Chief Engineer says:

> It is deemed proper to add that early consideration of the bill by Congress is important, as in the absence of congressional sanction of the proposition the department would not be justified in suspending or delaying for any considerable period the prosecution of the work already contracted for at Dam No. 17, and unless the necessary legislation is enacted within a reasonably short time the work must proceed in accordance with the plans heretofore adopted.

This plan also saves the cost of maintaining and operating four additional locks and dams which will be eliminated by it, which amounts to approximately $20,000 per annum.

This plan of improvement completes a stretch of river 56 miles in length on the Warrior and Mulberry prong, about 20 miles up the Locust Fork, another prong of the Black Warrior River. This reaches the largest coal companies and coal properties in the State of Alabama. It should be a great factor in the transportation of coal to cities and towns bordering the Gulf of Mexico and for Government coaling stations near Mobile, Dauphin Island, New Orleans, and the Panama Canal, besides aiding in the creating of electrical power, which will be distributed among private individuals and manufacturing plants of the Birmingham district, conserving a vast amount of coal.

Engineers recommend the passage of this bill at this extra session, as they do not want to incur any delay in the improvement of the Warrior River or any financial inconvenience that might incur to the contractor through an unreasonable delay.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12100) to supply a deficiency for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. SIMMONS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FORT WALLA WALLA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2193) to provide for the sale of the United States military reservation at Fort Walla Walla, Wash., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 96), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at a salary of $1,440 per annum during the Sixty-second Congress.

EMPLOYMENT OF LABORER.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 97), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a laborer at a salary of $720 per annum during the Sixty-second Congress.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

Mr. BRISTOW. I present an article written by ex-Congressman Fleming, of Georgia, on the election of Senators by the people. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY PEOPLE—SHALL A SECTIONAL BUGBEAR DEFEAT A NATIONAL DEMAND?

[By former Congressman William H. Fleming, Augusta, Ga.]

Under the United States Constitution, as drafted in 1787, the election of Senators was vested in the State legislatures, with the accompanying power in the Federal Congress to alter these State regulations as to the time and manner of holding the elections, excepting only as to the place of choosing the Senators—the locality being left for each State alone to fix.

In 1866 the Federal Congress exercised this power and prescribed the times and manner of elections of Senators by State legislatures and that law has been in force to the present day.

In recent years the Senate fell so much under the control of special interests, and became so unresponsive to public opinion, especially in framing tariff legislation, that an urgent demand arose for this body to be brought closer to the people and freed from the domination of machine politics.

The method fixed upon for accomplishing this object (whether wise or unwise, need not be discussed now), was to take the election of Senators away from the State legislators and give it to the State voters at the polls.

After years of persistent battling, this reform movement gradually won its way under the special championship of the Democratic Party.

As was perfectly natural in this process of evolution, the Senators themselves held out longest against the popular demand. But finally these gentlemen unstiffened their necks, and on June 12, 1911, agreed by formal vote of 64 to 24 to submit their claims hereafter directly to the voters of their respective States.

The triumph of the cause of the people was complete—almost.

But at the critical juncture of framing the proposed constitutional amendment a new issue was injected, one that had not been discussed before the people and one that formed no part of the popular demand for the direct election of Senators.

This new issue was the surrendering by the Federal Congress of its control, unquestioned since the foundation of the Government, over senatorial elections as to the time and manner of holding them.

The House joint resolution, passed early in the present session, was so drawn as to couple the popular election of Senators with the surrender of all preexisting Federal control over such elections.

When this house resolution came before the Senate on June 12, 1911, that body, by what is known as the Bristow amendment, changed the resolution so as to retain in the Federal Congress the power it had always possessed over the times and manner of holding elections for Senators, but voted in favor of direct election by the people.

The Bristow amendment conferred no new power on the Federal Congress; it simply reasserted an old power.

The House refused to concur in the Senate amendment, and the resolution went to conference, where it now rests.

Some able speeches have been delivered on this subject, notable among them being that of Senator BACON on February 10 and 27, 1911, when the Sutherland amendment, similar in effect to the Bristow amendment, was pending in the Senate.

It clearly appears from the discussions that the real ground of objection to the retention of its former power by Congress over the times and manner of holding elections for Senators is the fear of some of our Southern Congressmen that at some future day this power may be used to jeopardize white supremacy in the South.

Let us calmly consider the situation in a broad spirit of American citizenship.

What right in morals or in politics have we southern people to expect that Senators from Northern and Western States will yield up a Federal power over senatorial elections more than a century old in order to get enough southern votes to pass the constitutional amendment for direct election of Senators?

When did they ever make so one-sided a trade?

With what show of reason can we southern Democrats make our obedience to this popular demand and our loyalty to our specific platform pledge dependent upon the trading off by the North and West of a national power existing since 1787? No such condition was forecasted in the campaign before the people.

Should not our southern Democratic Congressmen have some consideration for their northern and western Democratic brethren who will be compelled in the next election to attempt a defense before the people of a position which we must admit is indefensible from the standpoint of those sections? These northern and western Democratic candidates will be, on this particular issue, at the mercy of their opponents. The more the people study the subject the more they will be convinced that the northern and western Senators were right in not accepting the terms offered. The people will not forget that in the last campaign the sole issue upon this subject was the popular election of Senators and not the surrender of Federal power.

This question of the Federal control or State control of senatorial elections is not entirely new—in fact, it is quite old. It was voted upon directly in the Constitutional Convention of 1787.

In the draft of the Constitution, as reported by the general committee on August 6, 1787, the provision relating to congressional elections read as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding the elections of the Members of each House shall be prescribed by the legislature of each State, but their provisions concerning them may at any time be altered by the Legislature of the United States."

A motion was made on August 9, 1787, to amend by striking out the words "each House" and inserting the words "the House of Representatives," thus apparently eliminating Federal control over senatorial elections. In the quaint but pointed language of the chronicler this motion "passed in the negative."

The tally sheet of the convention shows that only 1 State, namely, New Jersey, voted in favor of that amendment, while 10 States voted against it, namely, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; not voting, Rhode Island and New York.

It thus appears that all the Southern States, as represented by the men of that day, saw no wisdom in making any distinction between Representatives and Senators as to Federal control of elections.

It is also significant that the single reservation of power to the States to fix the places of choosing Senators, as it now exists, was never separately discussed or voted upon in the open convention, but got into the Constitution only through the report of the committee on "revision of style and arrangement," made on September 8, 1787, when the session was drawing to a close.

So it appears historically that the present position of southern Democrats in demanding this surrender of Federal power as a condition to permitting popular elections of Senators is a most embarrassing one—and the embarrassment will continue to increase as the next congressional campaign proceeds.

But again, as a question of political philosophy, our position would be equally assailable. It is rudimentary that every permanent national government should have final power of self-perpetuation, and not be dependent for its existence on independent agencies.

A majority of the States could, under the House resolution, without the Bristow amendment, "destroy the Government and dissolve the Union by simply declining to appoint Senators"—to employ an illustration used by John C. Calhoun in his Discourse on the Constitution and Government of the United States.

It is true, one side may ask, Why guard against such an improbability? But the ready answer of the other side is, Why surrender an existing power that prevents even the possibility of such a contingency?

Again, look at the discordant complications that might arise. Of course Congress, in either event, is to retain its power over elections for Representatives. Now, if the State is to be given sole power over elections for Senators, we will have the unseemly spectacle of two elections proceeding before the same body of voters, perhaps, on the same day for Members of the same Congress, one for Members of the House, subject to Federal control, and the other for Members of the Senate, subject to State control. Where is the logic or philosophy for that difference?

If this proposed amendment to the Constitution, bringing the Senate in direct touch with the people, shall be finally rejected in the House on the plea now set up, there will be no escape for southern Representatives from the responsibility of defeating this great reform movement of which the Democratic Party has been the avowed champion. Think of how poor an excuse we will have to offer for such a complete change of front.

Some may doubt the wisdom of changing the election of Senators from the legislators to the voters at the polls, but this much can be safely said: That of all the new political remedies for existing evils this one carries with it the greatest possibility of good and the least probability of harm. It in no wise affects the political status of a State under the Constitution. It merely eliminates the legislature as a sort of middle body or machine between the people and the Senate. State entity remains absolutely unimpaired so far as constitutional provisions can keep it so.

When three Republican Presidents—McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft—have braved party prejudice and exhibited a statesmanship Nation-wide in its scope, how can we southern Democrats afford to display a narrow sectionalism that would sacrifice the national welfare to vague and vanishing fears of negro domination? We are the weaker section numerically and financially. Therefore, our safety must lie in breaking down sectionalism and appealing to the broad patriotism of the whole people.

For us to make the State control of senatorial elections a condition of permitting popular election of Senators would be bad in law and worse in politics. As a practical means of protection to the whites of the South, in the event we should ever need such protection, it would scarcely be worth a continental.

We have had white supremacy since we emerged from reconstruction, and we intend to hold on to it. Our people are united on that. The only real difference is that some of us believe that in the long reach of events the best way to preserve our racial supremacy is to treat the negro honestly as an American citizen under the Constitution, while some others appear to prefer a less commendable method of procedure.

Let us not act as if we were outside the Union. We are back in our "father's house" to stay. Let us show that the South is an integral, living, energizing part of our common country, ready in a generous spirit of patriotism to think and act for the common good.

Why should we permit this sectional bugbear of imperiled white supremacy to defeat this almost triumphant movement in behalf of the great masses of the people?

It is more like stating a truism than venturing a prophecy to say that the American people, either now or in the near future, are going to force popular elections of Senators by the individual States. The only open question is, Whether they are going to elect enough Democrats to surrender Federal control according to the House plan or elect enough Republicans to retain Federal control according to the Senate plan? Who doubts which plan will succeed?

For a Nation with our history behind it to knowingly at this stage increase State power at the expense of long-established Federal power would surely be a political anachronism. The controlling forces are pulling in the opposite direction.

"The stars in their courses fought against Sisera." So will it be with southern Democracy when it undertakes to force the Nation to surrender to the States a power given it by the fathers in 1787.

Apparently, the wisest course for House Democrats to pursue would be to recede from their position and vote for the resolution as it came from the Senate. A great many of their constituents would indorse such a course.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412, the reciprocity bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. With pleasure.

Mr. STONE. Before the Senator from Iowa proceeds, I thought I might suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania, in charge of the bill, that if he would ask unanimous consent to fix a day for a vote on the bill—the Senate seems to be in good humor this morning—it is possible his request might be granted.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania, the Senator from Iowa yielding.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I had intended bringing up that matter this morning, but in view of the fact that the Senator from Iowa desires to address the Senate, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] desires to follow him, I thought I would delay it until to-morrow or later in the day in order to suit the convenience of the Senators who announced their intention to speak.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I assure the Senate that I feel very grateful for the consideration already extended to me, and I beg you all to believe that I will not ask your indulgence to any great extent this morning if I am permitted to go forward with my argument in an orderly way. I do not by this suggestion mean to say that I ought not to be and must not be interrupted; on the contrary, I will yield to any interruption; but I say it rather by way of apology and excuse for the great length of time that I have already consumed.

I propose to prove this morning that the amendments which I have presented to the pending bill and which enlarge the free list very greatly, so far as our own country is concerned, could be adopted and the articles named in the amendments would still be dutiable under our general tariff law as to all countries except Canada.

I will say in passing that with respect to many of the items I have named in these amendments I will be perfectly willing to see them made free to the whole world, and if I have an opportunity to so vote I will so vote; but there are some of the articles which I have named in my amendments, and which under them will be put upon the free list so far as Canada is concerned, that I would not be willing to make free to the entire commercial world. Therefore I feel that it is a part of my duty to establish the proposition that they can all be attached to the free list in this bill without interfering with our tariff relations with any other country.

When I suspended this address a few days ago I was calling the attention of the Senate to the first treaty in which the American doctrine appears. It is indeed the first treaty entered into by what is now the United States. The treaty was made during the progress of the Revolutionary War. It is the well-known and the well-understood treaty with France of 1778. It is in the following terms, so far as the subject under consideration is concerned:

> The Most Christian King and the United States engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations with respect of commerce and navigation which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same favor freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession was conditional.

I remarked the other day that the continental or European policy had been prior to this time, and it has continued practically without exception until now to employ unconditional language in stipulations like this, so that automatically any reduction in duties made by one of the parties to the treaty is extended to every other country with which the first country has treaty relations. It is not so with the United States. From the very beginning we have insisted that concessions granted to one country are only granted to another with which we have treaty relations provided the other country renders to us the same compensation that was exacted from the country to which we had granted favors.

There followed treaties with Sweden in 1793, and Prussia in 1785, with similar provisions. Throughout the whole period intervening between our earliest treaty and the present time the United States has, with a rare exception now and then—there are just three of them, I think, in our whole diplomatic history—employed either literally or substantially the language I have quoted. Other countries in treaties between themselves have used sometimes the conditional and sometimes the unconditional clause, England alone having adhered with matured consistency to the unconditional theory. The variation of the form quite frequently used by the United States is as follows—and I quote now the exact phraseology which will be found in nearly all our modern treaties:

> The high contracting parties agree that in all that concerns navigation and commerce favors which either has granted or may hereafter grant to another state, shall become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession is freely made, or upon allowing the same compensation if the concession was conditional.

There is no substantial difference between the form I first read, which was employed in our first treaty with France in 1778, and the one which I have just read, which occurs in the most recent treaty we have made upon the subject.

The diplomatic history of the United States has volumes of correspondence touching the interpretation of this clause in our treaties, and the United States has never departed from what is called the American doctrine; that is to say, that a favor or a reduction of duties extended by our country to another for a consideration which we believed to be an equivalent, is not under the clause extended to another nation, unless such other nation grants to us a concession—now mark this—which we find to be the equivalent of the concession granted by the first-named country.

I want Senators to remember that it is not always true that a third nation by granting to us the exact concession which purchased from us a reduction in duties is entitled to the same reduction of duties, for there are very many other considerations which enter into such reciprocal arrangements. This is an important matter and I realize many Senators would not be willing to vote for these amendments if by their adoption we extended free trade in the articles named to all the countries of the world, and I want to put myself upon very safe ground in that respect. I quote from one of the acknowledged textbooks upon this particular subject, "Favored Nation Treatment," by Herod, and I read from his summing up on page 112:

> The general clause of the most favored nation does not comprehend special engagements of reciprocity. It sometimes happens that States, owing to propinquity or to some exceptional condition—> in their international commercial relations enter into special arrangements founded upon mutual concession. The essence of these special treaties of reciprocity, and the reason that the favors extended by them can not be enjoyed under the most-favored-nation clause, is that the equivalents given for the privileges secured are exceptional—the like of which no other State can offer.

Taking now the President's view of the subject before us—and I think it is a very fair and a very sane and a very patriotic view—our relations toward Canada are peculiar. Her proximity to us, the similarity between the habits, character, and ambitions of the people, the fact that 3,000 miles of undefended territorial line separate that country from our own, all these things segregate Canada from the remainder of the world and warrant us in making arrangements with her which are peculiar in themselves; and even if any other nation were desirous of making to us precisely the same concessions that Canada grants to us, it does not follow that under the favored-nation clause our concessions granted to Canada would also be granted to such other nation or nations. I resume the reading:

> If the equivalent or its like can be and is offered by another State then the engagement loses its character as special, and the favor for which the equivalent was given must be extended upon equal terms to other nations entitled to favored-nation treatment. It is not sufficient that one State says to another, "If you grant me an advantage over all other nations in your market I will give you a corresponding advantage in mine," for this is just what the favored-nation clause is intended to prevent, namely, unfair discrimination. On the other hand, where these treaties incorporate a number of mutual concessions, it is not fair to say that a concession on one particular point was in consideration of an advantage in one particular subject granted by the other party. The sum of the concessions granted on one side must be taken as the consideration for the total of the favors obtained from the other. It will be difficult to prove the special character of a treaty of reciprocity involving only mutual concessions in matters of commerce and navigation, unless the contracting States are closely allied either geographically or politically. Where a State has by special treaty of reciprocity granted favors in matters in commerce and navigation, it should in justice grant to every other power with which it has treaty relations an opportunity—

Here is the real operation of the favored-nation clause. It is an agreement against hostile conduct; it is an agreement that the nations entering into it will approach any negotiations to reach like results in a fair spirit. I read again:

> Where a state has by special treaty of reciprocity granted favors in matters in commerce and navigation, it should in justice grant to every other power with which it has treaty relations an opportunity by negotiation to arrive at what would be a fair equivalent for the favors extended by the special treaty.

Senators, this is the best statement of the American doctrine which I have been able to discover, and I think it is complete and conclusive. But I desire to read a word from a bulletin issued by the University of Wisconsin which contains as luminous a history of the favored-nation clause as can be found anywhere. Speaking of the favored-nation clause, the author says:

It is not usually considered as comprehending special arrangements and reciprocity between nations, where, on account of proximity or special circumstances, reason exists for relations which can not be shared by the world at large. Special relations between a colony and the mother country are generally understood to be exempt from the operation of the clause. The term "most-favored nation" is sometimes replaced by "most-favored foreign nation," though even where not so specified that meaning is understood, as the contracting parties do not mean, for the purposes of the clause, that reciprocal relations between themselves and their colonies shall be considered as standards for most-favored-nation treatment.

With these exceptions, the scope of the clause appears to be limited only by its wording and the interpretation put upon that wording. The clause sometimes stipulates that whatever advantages are accorded by either contracting party to a third state shall extend to the other; sometimes, that this shall be so without equivalent; sometimes it forbids putting obstacles to the commerce of one which are not extended to the commerce of other nations.

I also read a word from the first decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in which the question came under review. It is the case of Bertram against Robertson, reported in One hundred and twenty-second United States, at page 116. This was a suit brought against the collector of the port of New York, arising out of the claim of one who imported goods from Denmark, or from a colony of Denmark, to be admitted to all the rights and privileges which the United States had granted to Hawaii at an early time by a treaty by which certain Hawaiian sugar was admitted free into the United States. I shall read very little of it. It is sufficient to say that the claim was denied by the Supreme Court of the United States. The court says:

Those stipulations, even if conceded to be self-executing by the way of a proviso or exception to the general law imposing the duties, do not cover concessions like those made to the Hawaiian Islands for a valuable consideration. They were pledges of the two contracting parties, the United States and the King of Denmark, to each other, that in the imposition of duties on goods imported into one of the countries which were the produce or manufacture of the other, there should be no discrimination against them in favor of goods of like character imported from any other country. They imposed an obligation upon both countries to avoid hostile legislation in that respect. But they were not intended to interfere with special arrangements with other countries founded upon a concession of special privileges. The stipulations were mutual, for reciprocal advantages. "No higher or other duties" were to be imposed by either upon the goods specified; but if any particular favor should be granted by either to other countries in respect to commerce or navigation, the concession was to become common to the other party upon like consideration—that is, it was to be enjoyed freely if the concession were freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession were conditional.

This doctrine was amplified and emphasized in the case of Whitney against Robertson, arising under the same treaty upon an importation from San Domingo. The case of Whitney against Robertson is reported in One hundred and twenty-fourth United States, at page 190. I have, Mr. President, before me a series of citations relating to the construction of this clause of our treaty, but will not enlarge the record by reading from all of them.

I desire, however, to read a moment in closing from Moore's Digest of International Law, at page 277 and following.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator object if I ask at this point a question for the consideration of that phase in connection with the favored nation clause?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. The authorities to which the Senator has directed the attention of the Senate are based upon a stated condition of facts. It has occurred to me that, inasmuch as there is no treaty in this case, the rule stated—especially in the Whitney case—does not apply. In that case there was a treaty. It was not a commercial contract by legislation. Now, in our case, the case before us, Canada has stated not a treaty, but a legislative agreement and has expressed in terms the relations which shall exist because of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Reporter complains that he is not able to hear the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. HEYBURN. There appears to be no mutuality between Canada and our Government in regard to the results that shall flow from this legislative contract. Canada in express terms provides exactly the relation that shall arise out of it as between Canada and other countries, and our Government is silent on the subject. It seems to me that it has much to do with the application of the decisions in regard to that matter because they were based upon existing treaties, and we have no treaties.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe the Senator from Idaho is right with respect to one inference to be drawn from his statement and wrong with respect to another. There is no difference between legislative reciprocity and reciprocity by treaty, so far as the application of the favored-nation clause is concerned. The ultimate test is, What has the country done? and it may do it either through treaty where it is within the scope of the treaty-making power or it may do it through legislation entirely. But the Senator from Idaho is quite right in saying that the character of the bill introduced into the Canadian Parliament does rob the whole subject of its essential reciprocal features.

I have not ventured upon that phase of it because I am speaking in ignorance of the Canadian proposition. We have no official knowledge of what is taking place in Canada. It is proposed here that a certain tender shall be made to the Dominion of Canada, and what Canada has done or shall do with respect to the tender is, in my opinion, immaterial. We are determining whether we ought to make the tender; but I wholly agree with the Senator from Idaho that if the acceptance of the tender—if we make one—is in the terms proposed in the resolution offered by Mr. Fielding, he will have put in jeopardy the entire arrangement, in my opinion, because it is not reciprocal, and he destroys the exclusive character of the arrangement by the provisions he has inserted in it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask if there is any possible doubt as to the accuracy of Mr. Fielding's statement as to the letter and the effect of their legislation on that question? It came to this Government officially.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there is no doubt about it. But I take this view of that part of it: If this bill shall pass, and if Canada accepts it, in order to avail herself of it she must accept it in a way that will carry out its provisions. I take it that the President of the United States would not be so indifferent to the performance of his duty as to accept an arrangement or a bill passed by the Canadian Parliament that would instantly destroy the reciprocal features of the adjustment of these duties that we are attempting to make. That responsibility is upon the President of the United States. I do not know whether Canada will adhere to that form of treating with us or not. In my opinion she can not, if she desires to avail herself of the reciprocity that is proposed in this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. When the message came in, I think the President had as accurate information and as full information as he now has as to the language and scope of that bill. I think Senators had. There is no reason to believe there has been any new feature introduced into it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Idaho is quite right. The resolution he has in mind is the one originally introduced into the Canadian Parliament, but it has not yet passed, and I take it that when it is passed, if it ever does pass, it must be an acceptance of our proposition or it would not be binding upon us, and the President of the United States will not issue the proclamation that is there provided for.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been giving as close attention to the proceedings over there as it is convenient for any of us to give to them, and I have seen nothing that indicated any suggestion of change from the terms of that resolution. No amendment has been offered, so far as I have been able to advise myself, that that resolution shall be changed in any particular.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Idaho just now, and in view of the fact that we have incorporated in the present bill section 2, which is utterly outside of the scope of the reciprocity agreement, with which the Canadian bill is supposed to correspond, what is the effect of that legislation? Will section 2 of the bill come within the scope of any reciprocity?

Mr. CUMMINS. My opinion is it will not; that it is an independent proposition for that particular subject.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me one word more? Would not that bring in force as to that subject the favored-nation clause?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have been in doubt with regard to that. It would depend upon whether in diplomacy it were held that the concession which we grant to Canada is a gratuitous concession. The concession which Canada grants to us is so insignificant and trifling, in regard to wood pulp and paper, that I doubt whether it would sustain the agreement. If, however, wood pulp and paper could be brought within the scope of the entire arrangement, then I think it would be entirely possible for us to grant to Canada free paper and free wood pulp without asking from Canada any concession with regard to wood pulp or paper. In other words, true reciprocity does not necessarily involve the reduction of duties upon the same articles or admitting the same articles to the free list. We could very well grant to Canada certain concessions that might have no relation whatsoever commercially to the concessions that Canada might grant to us.

Now, the difficulty about the present arrangement is as the Senator from Minnesota has said. For some reason or other the House has segregated section 2 from the remainder of the bill, and it is doubtful whether it will be controlled by the provisos and the conditions of the previous part of the bill. If it is not so controlled then it is not reciprocal, and we would be in danger of the favored-nation clause.

But I desire to read from the instructions of the State Department given upon some treaties—and I will not go into their history—negotiated under the McKinley law of 1890; treaties that were negotiated as all know by a very eminent statesman of my own State, Mr. Kasson. They were complained of. They never went into effect. They were never ratified by the Senate or by Congress. But nevertheless certain nations complained about the negotiations in progress between our State Department and other countries; and this is the statement made in response:

It is clearly evident that the object sought in all the varying forms of expression is equality of international treatment, protection against the willful preference of the commercial interests of one nation over another. But the allowance of the same privileges and the same sacrifice of revenue duties to a nation which makes no compensation, that had been conceded to another nation for an adequate compensation, instead of maintaining, destroys that equality of market privileges which the "most-favored-nation" clause was intended to secure. It concedes for nothing to one friendly nation what the other gets only for a price. It would thus become the source of international inequality and provoke international hostility.

The neighborhood of nations, their border interests, their differences of climate, soil, and production, their respective capacity for manufacture, their widely different demands for consumption, the magnitude of the reciprocal markets, are so many conditions which require special treatment. No general tariff can satisfy such demands. It would require a certainty of language which excludes the possibility of doubt to justify the opinion that the government of any commercial nation had annulled its natural right to meet these special conditions by compensatory concessions, or held the right only on condition of extending the same to a nation which had no compensation to offer. The fact that such concessions, if made, would inevitably inure to the equal benefit of a third competitor would often destroy the motive for, as well as the value of, such reciprocal concessions.

All that tends to one certain conclusion, namely, that this country can offer Canada whatsoever it pleases. It matters not how wide may be the range of its reductions; it matters not how emphatic may be our concessions as compared with hers; if we want for the good of our people to give to Canada free trade in every product that enters the markets of the United States for what we believe to be a fair and equivalent concession on the part of Canada, no matter how meager that concession may be, no other nation upon the face of the earth can complain of our conclusion or our determination in that respect.

We have a right to take into account her proximity to us, the character of her people, the habits of her people, the conditions of her production—all these things we may well consider in order to determine what we may give to her for her concessions to us.

I read just one more sentence and I shall have finished this history. I read a sentence or two from the interpretation of the most-favored-nation clause by Chester Lloyd Jones, instructor in political science in the University of Pennsylvania, found in the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, following page 383. I read from page 385:

In spite of the apparent simplicity of this principle conflict has repeatedly arisen as to the proper interpretation of the "most-favored-nation" guarantees. The point which is the subject of contention usually narrows down to this: When nation A grants special terms to nation B as to the importation of certain articles in return for concessions by nation B on certain points, does that give all other nations with the "most-favored-nation" clause in their treaties the right to demand the same concessions—upon their declaring their willingness to yield the same points yielded to nation B. Is it permissible, on the other hand, to maintain that the grant to nation B for the return of special concessions gives the other nations only the right to demand a similar grant when they have themselves made concessions which the treaty-making power of nation A shall consider the equivalent of those made by nation B?

Now, mark you—

And this is the whole crux of the somewhat intricate and difficult problem:

Suppose, for example, that the United States should grant specially low duties on French dry goods in return for low duties on American agricultural machinery. Is it open to Germany to demand the same terms for her dry goods under her "most-favored-nation" treaty upon the tender of the same terms on imports of American agricultural machinery, or may the United States contend that the grant of low duties to German dry goods would be more than an equivalent return, and would therefore place Germany not on the general basis of the most-favored nation (presumable in this case, France), but would make her an especially favored nation, thus, in fact, violating the very principle which the "most-favored-nation" clause was intended to guarantee? In other words, are reciprocity agreements to be considered as automatically extending to all nations with "most-favored-nation" clauses in their treaties, or must each be the subject of a special negotiation, a special bargain between the countries involved, except where the favors are freely granted?

I will not read further, but I commend this article to the consideration of those who desire to pursue the subject further. The answer given by the author is that when any third nation demands from us the same concessions upon our duties we may make to a given country it is for us to determine whether the same concessions would be equivalent or not, and it is for us to say what will be the equivalents that will secure to the third country the same concessions we have theretofore granted to another.

I assume that all this is elementary. It was somewhat new to me, however, and I pursued the investigation with a great deal of interest.

I conclude by saying that whatever agreement, whatever proposal we desire to make to Canada we may make, and it matters not whether our concessions are large and hers small or hers large and ours small. It is for the Congress of the United States to say whether they be or be not proper equivalents of each other.

Therefore my amendments to the bill before us will not subject us to any danger from the favored-nation clause unless there is some force or some conclusiveness in the arrangement that was made between Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson on the one side and our Secretary of State upon the other.

Now, if we are bound by that arrangement, then of course any concession that we would make which would enlarge the concession on our part without asking any additional concessions upon the part of Canada would be a concession freely made, and we would then have free trade in that article or commodity with the whole world.

But I want to remind Senators that Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson came here unauthoritatively so far as the Parliament of Canada is concerned. We do not know what Canada will accept or will not accept. We know that Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson have agreed with Mr. Knox that they mutually will do what they can, the latter to secure the passage of this bill by Congress and the former to secure the passage of some corresponding legislation by the Parliament of Canada.

That is all that they have done; all that they could do. That was too much. That was beyond the authority at least of our State Department or of our Executive, whatever may be the authority of Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson, and I say nothing about that. I do not know what their ministerial authority may have been.

But my proposition is this: When this bill was introduced in the House of Representatives, where alone it could take form, where alone it could be given lawful force, it was in the province of the House of Representatives to make whatsoever proposition to Canada the Members of that body desired to make. The House of Representatives did make a certain proposition to Canada and we have it before us for consideration. It is a proposition contained in a bill as amendable as any other bill which comes from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and therefore it is within our power—it is more than within our power, it is our imperative duty—to make just such proposition to Canada as we think the welfare of our people demand, whatever that is. And it makes no difference whether our concessions are broadened or whether they be narrowed, the origin of the proposal is here; it is not with Mr. Fielding or Mr. Paterson, and it is not with the Secretary of State. If in order to do justice to our own people, having lifted them up to a high plane of protective duties, having created artificial prices for all we sell and all that we buy, we believe that when we take one great class of producers down from this high plane we must also take others down a part way at least, if we believe that anything short of this will be unjust to our people, then we have a right to add to the concession mentioned by the Secretary of State and approved by the House of Representatives such other concessions as are absolutely necessary to render justice to our own country.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Maine in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I have listened with much interest to what the Senator has said about the favored-nation clause. He gave a somewhat comprehensive review of authorities. I want to direct his attention to the fact that our newest judicial tribunal, the Court of Customs Appeals, recently passed judgment upon that subject, and I am sure the Senator will not wish to omit a reference to it. I have not seen the text of the decision; I saw the newspaper report of it. I can not give the name of the case nor can I state accurately the extent of the decision, but it was upon the question which the Senator has discussed, and I thought it was but just to that tribunal to call attention to the fact that that is probably the most recent utterance on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am obliged to the Senator from Georgia. I remember seeing a newspaper notice of the decision of the Customs Court, but in some way or other it escaped my mind. I have not the decision before me, and I am not familiar with it, but before this debate is finished I will find the opinion, and whether it be for or against the position I have assumed I will lay it before the Senate. I think, however, in a general way it is in harmony with the opinions I have already read.

Mr. BACON. I gathered from the newspaper reports I saw of it that it is in harmony with the Senator's position, but I am not sure about that.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. The authorities cited by the Senator from Iowa are very distinguished and very learned publicists and courts, but, as a matter of fact, all the authorities are decisions of some of our people on what the favored-nation clause is. I wish to inquire of the Senator if he, in his research, has found any instances where the question has arisen between different nations and has had any interpretation from an international standpoint?

Mr. CUMMINS. Most of the authorities that I have read have been connected with international correspondence.

Mr. BROWN. That is very true.

Mr. CUMMINS. The United States has adhered steadily, without any departure whatsoever, to the rule that I have announced. But Europe for a hundred years now has been protesting against our construction of the rule of the favored-nation clause. The correspondence between the United States and nearly every country in the world is full of protestations against our interpretation of the clause. But the United States has unwaveringly adhered to her interpretation, and she intends to adhere to her interpretation, because, at least since 1886, it has had the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BROWN. That is just the point I should like to understand. All these precedents and authorities are our own. They have never been accepted by any other country.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, sir.

Mr. BROWN. Which might raise the question as to this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The only country I believe in the world that has accepted our interpretation is Japan, and she has construed the favored-nation clause just as the United States does. Fortunately, however, it is our interpretation that will stand. There is no tribunal upon the face of the earth that has the jurisdiction or the power to overrule the interpretation which has been put upon this clause by the State Department as well as the judicial department of the United States.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator is entirely right about that. The point I was making is simply the fact that all the authorities are American authorities, and wherever the question has been raised with another country the other country has taken the other side of the controversy, unless, as the Senator suggests, Japan agrees with us, and Japan had not been cited by the Senator as in agreement with America.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not quite understand the point of the interruption or inquiry. I should like to answer if the Senator from Nebraska will make it just a little clearer. Does he think that because all these authorities which have put constructions upon the clause are of our own country, therefore they are not entitled to respect or obedience?

Mr. BROWN. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would like to get the exact idea in the Senator's mind.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator, on reflection, will understand that that was not my point at all. I am not discussing the merits of the controversy one way or the other. But the Senator was citing authorities of professors and courts and letters from our executive department to sustain his interpretation, and he left the case resting on those authorities. I had supposed that there were international precedents which were either in agreement with us and in agreement with him or in dispute with him, and I wanted to find out about those.

Mr. CUMMINS. All these precedents are international precedents, because it would be impossible for the cases to arise in any other way than through an international controversy.

Mr. BROWN. Of course, the authority which the Senator read from the learned professor from Pennsylvania was not a question arising out of a controversy with any other nation. He was simply discussing the ethics of the science of the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Therein the Senator from Nebraska is mistaken. The author mentioned was discussing the correspondence and rules of our diplomatic authorities. Of course, the question could not arise in any other way than by a question made by some other nation. But fortunately our country determines the terms upon which imports shall enter our customhouses, and when the United States rules that a certain country is not entitled to reductions in duties under the favored-nation clause it is a final determination, and there is no court to which it can be referred except the court of war. Therefore, I think my authorities are entirely conclusive. I stated originally that the countries of Europe in all negotiations and treaties with each other do not employ our clause. Nearly all the countries of Europe employ an unconditional clause, which gives by its very terms the same reductions to every other country that is given to a particular country.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me to supplement what he has so ably said, it is not only a fact that our diplomatic department, the State Department, has given it that interpretation, but there are two instances the Senator from Iowa cited, that of Denmark and San Domingo, where they questioned the action of the State Department and brought it into our courts, and it resulted in the same view; so we have here in our country not only the opinion of the diplomatic department in the case, which has been consistent from the beginning, but we also have the decision of our Supreme Court. As the Senator from Iowa has well said, nothing can settle those things except war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have finished my argument in regard to this case. I hope that when the apprehension which seems to have been in the minds of some Senators is removed we may proceed to the examination of not this treaty, but this bill, with the same freedom that we approach every other matter of legislation, and that amendments will be either accepted or rejected according to the consciences of the Senators who vote for or against them.

I sincerely trust that the cloud which has seemed to envelop the Senate of the United States and to stifle thought and stifle judgment and stifle freedom will disappear and that we will consider and dispose of this measure just as we believe it ought to be disposed of, for the public good, blind to every extrinsic figure and deaf to every extrinsic influence.

If we do otherwise we will abdicate our duties and we will desert our responsibilities, and if the people shall eventually conclude that having refused to perform our duty, and having refused to bear our responsibilities, there is no longer need of the Senate of the United States in the economy of government they will not have wandered far afield.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. This reciprocity scheme coming before us not in the form of a treaty but in the form of a bill, have we not as much right to amend this limited tariff bill as any other tariff bill, and what right has the executive department to say to us that we must not amend the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. The question of the Senator from Minnesota is a very apt one, and ought to arouse every patriotic and liberty-loving instinct in the Members of this body. It is to me repugnant to think that any influence beyond these walls, any influence save our own sense of right and justice, shall determine whether these amendments or any of them shall become parts of the bill or no.

I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I briefly review the situation from the standpoint of the great majority of the progressive Republicans here and elsewhere. I do not want any Senator to feel that I use this term invidiously or in a critical spirit. By progressive Republicans I mean every believer in the protective doctrine, who, at the same time, has pledged himself to do what he can to reduce our tariff duties to the point at which they will fairly measure the difference between the cost of production here and elsewhere.

The agitation for the revision of the tariff from this point of view began 10 years ago, and it began because a great body of the people felt that the high duties of the Dingley law, duties that may have been possibly defensible in 1897 but which were not defensible in 1901, should be reduced; that the duties should be taken down from their high elevation to the level of American life; just so low that they would enable American producers to live and prosper and profitably enter American markets, but not so high as to enable American producers to exact unfair and unjust profits from the consuming public.

This agitation was emphasized because it was known that in the large fields of industry competition had been exterminated and because prices were fixed by the arbitrary will of men who had no other guide except to take and to keep all that the traffic would bear.

The struggle continued for years. At first there were but few who were willing to incur the odium of an attack upon the system of protection as applied in the law of 1897, but the number grew and their force and strength multiplied until the battle culminated in the Republican convention of 1908, which did two things.

It prescribed a rule for the application of the protective doctrine which had never before been prescribed in all the history of our party. In all the campaigns between our doctrine and the doctrine espoused by my friends upon the other side the protective policy had never been definitely and accurately defined. It was accurately stated in 1908, and I thought that a bow of promise illuminated the political heavens. I thought, too, that very soon the burdens which extraordinary and indefensible taxation had put upon the people of this country would be lightened, for in this same platform we declared that the work of revision should be immediately undertaken in a special session to be called for that purpose. So our party, holding this principle and advocating this policy, triumphed in the election of 1908.

It triumphed because a majority of the people of this country believed in the doctrine of protection; a majority of them believed that our greatest prosperity is to be found in reasonable and fair duties levied upon foreign products in order to equalize unequal conditions between our country and countries across the sea.

It was in this spirit that we entered the fight of 1909. I will not dwell upon that controversy. It is sufficient to say that in my opinion the tariff act of 1909 did not fairly comply with or fulfill the promise of the platform of 1908. It did not so reduce duties that they measured the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. After the tariff law of 1909 was passed the same Republicans who had struggled for the announcement in the platform of 1908 went out into the country and declared that the Republican Party had been unfaithful to its promise, had not fulfilled the obligation which it had assumed, and we asked that Congress again turn its attention to this important work and relieve the people of some of the injustice of this taxation.

At the same time there had arisen the demand for a tariff commission. It arose, indeed, contemporaneously with the demand for lower duties in 1901 and 1902 and 1903 and 1904, but it took on new form and it became a living question after the session of 1909, when all of us became convinced, as we never had been before, that it was impossible to revise the tariff of the country according to the Republican doctrine without full, complete, and comprehensive knowledge with regard to conditions of production and the cost of doing things here as compared with the cost of doing the same things elsewhere. As we passed out of the session of 1909 those of us who had fought for lower duties declared that it was not our purpose to again ask for a revision of the tariff until we could have the information that would be furnished by an impartial and independent tariff commission; so that when once we established the level of duties in accordance with our promise, business might have some stability, men might know what to do, men might look forward into the future and determine what undertakings they might safely enter upon. So, we fought along the pathway of business stability and at the same time of reasonable, fair, and adequate tariff readjustment; and we passed into the last session knowing that it was our most imperative duty to equip the Government of this country with a commission that could adequately examine all these questions and whose information might be some guide to those of us who thereafter undertook to reduce duties to the point of the difference between the cost of production here and elsewhere. All session long we begged the Senate of the United States to adopt a law which would create a Tariff Commission and clothe it with adequate, full, and complete power—a commission that would be independent of the executive department and independent of every other department, save the department which alone can make laws and which alone can change tariff duties.

We succeeded, at the expenditure of all our strength and under severe criticism from some very good people who were compelled to sit here all night in the closing days of the session, in passing the bill which proposed to create a Tariff Commission with full powers and independent of every other department of the Government. We passed it, however, so late that the ingenuity of our friends upon the other side, manifested in the House of Representatives, was able to defeat the bill. Therefore we closed the session with the same inadequate administration of tariff matters that we had before, but we intended, as all the world knows, to continue the fight for a Tariff Commission, and in the meanwhile we intended, as all the world knows, to rely upon the board of experts which had been authorized in the law of 1909—not sufficient, not equipped with proper power, but I think intent upon the performance of its duty and able to furnish some information, some knowledge, about these intricate subjects to Congress as it came to amend and revise the tariff schedule by schedule, for in the meantime these same Republicans declared that they desired to amend our tariff schedule by schedule and not to await the slow development of all the knowledge upon the whole range of the tariff. As the commission came to a completion of its work schedule by schedule they insisted that Congress should take these matters up and dispose of them according to their very right and justice.

I for one would not have objected; on the contrary I would have hailed the opportunity to have taken the agricultural schedule first. I am not opposing the proposition before us simply because it seeks to change the agricultural schedule; I am not opposing the proposition before us simply because it has singled out the interests of the western country and has still further fortified the interests of the eastern country; I would have been willing to have taken up the agricultural schedule first and to have put just such duties on every agricultural product as would measure the difference between the cost of producing them here and in Canada or elsewhere; but in the midst of a program which seemed to me to have the assent of all men who believe in the protective tariff, in the midst of an effort to introduce into the business world that steadiness which it so much needs and which it so highly demands, we are met with the proposition to revise the tariff so far as Canada is concerned without any information whatsoever other than that which belongs to all intelligent people with regard to the difference between the cost of production in the United States and in Canada.

I believe that it was most unwise, most unfortunate, for the cause of tariff reform, most unfortunate not only for those whose capital is invested in business and for those whose labor must be employed in business, but unfortunate for those of us who for years have struggled to attain the one result, namely, reasonable duties upon those things that are now burdened with excessive impositions. It was unfortunate, as we were in reasonable association with respect to the way in which to work out the best interests of all the people, that just at that moment the executive department saw fit to precipitate into a caldron that is rarely quiet, and that was never so much disturbed as at the present moment, the proposal for reciprocity with Canada. I believe the effect of it will be to set back the hand upon the dial of progress; I believe the effect of it will be to postpone the day when the American people will see fair and reasonable duties upon all things that come from the hands of the American workmen. This is my complaint against the proposal for the revision of our tariff with Canada.

It, of course, would be idle to make this complaint if it were true that the outcome would be a lessening of the burdens of the people. If we could accomplish in this way a real reduction in excessive and grievous duties, then the mere road that we may travel in order to reach that result is immaterial; but here we are in midsummer, tortured with heat, impatient of delay, making a titanic effort to remove duties from the only things the price of which the proposers of the measure declare will not be affected in the least. A more profitless campaign I have never known in American political life.

No longer ago than yesterday the President of the United States declared again that no one need fear the present arrangement, because nobody would be hurt. Putting aside the question of free paper—I take it for granted, of course, that the mighty newspaper world is not influenced by the print-paper clause in this arrangement; I take it that the unanimity with which the newspapers of this country are now singing the praises of reciprocity does not come from any unanimity in benefits to be enjoyed; I put that phase of it aside—the only thing that you are trying to do to help the American people is to reduce or remove duties upon agricultural products; and in the very breath in which you declare that those duties must be removed you declare that the duties do not affect in anywise whatsoever the price or prices of agricultural products.

I have no great desire to enter into a joint debate with the President of the United States. Ordinarily I would hold his high office immune from any comment upon my part of the views held by the Chief Executive; but when he abandons his office—I am not saying that in any disparaging sense, but he is abandoning his office; he is attempting to lead public opinion in favor of the reciprocity agreement; I do not criticize him for doing it; I do not complain of it; it is vastly better for him to go through the country endeavoring to form and mold and create or destroy impressions and opinions than it is for him to use the power of his great office to carry through the bill which we are now considering—when he does leave the duties of his office and enters a campaign of enlightenment and of education with respect to a question of this sort, then he is on the same level with every man of America, and he can not be exempt from the ordinary comments and criticisms respecting the weight to be attached to arguments that he uses. He said at Indianapolis yesterday:

> It is said that this Canadian reciprocity agreement is made wholly at the expense of the farmers and only in the interest of those who would have farm products at a less price, to wit, the wage earners of the large cities. It is my own judgment that the reciprocity agreement will not greatly reduce the cost of living, if at all.

I ask my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] why we are sweltering here in the midsummer heat if to remove the duties upon agricultural products will not reduce their price at all? If these duties have not enhanced the price in the past and their removal will not reduce their price in the future, why are we here engaged in the Herculean task of taking the duties off agricultural products that have never afflicted the people of the United States and either leaving or advancing the duties upon manufactured products against which a universal complaint has been made, a complaint that has been ringing from one border of this country to the other for now more than a decade? Do you not think that we had better expend a little of our time and a little of our strength in removing some of the duties which will affect the cost of living rather than expend it all in removing the duties which affect, according to the views of my distinguished leader, the President of the United States, no prices whatsoever? However, I must do him justice, because a little later in the same speech which was intended to bring a club in Indianapolis with progressive tendencies into harmony with his views, he says:

Now, mark you, he has just said that, in his opinion, the removal of these duties would not greatly reduce the cost of living, if at all. Now, he says:

> Indiana is fairly representative of the States of the Middle West in its relation to Canadian reciprocity. Its consumers will benefit by the remission of duties on food products and by the remission of the duties on fish—

Will some friend of this arrangement inform the Senate before the debate shall have finished how the remission of these duties upon agricultural products will benefit the consumers of food products in Indiana if the remission does not affect the cost of living at all?

The day was hot and was not conducive to logical reasoning. I confess, of course, to the same influence. I can understand how a man speaking as he did and as I do under the blaze of a midsummer sun might wander into inconsistencies. I have pointed his out. Will some Senator here point mine out before the debate shall have finished?

The President says also that we will undoubtedly export to Canada a greater volume of agricultural products than we have hitherto. I believe we may increase our exports slightly. But what benefit is it for the American agricultural producer to export his commodities to Canada rather than to any other country? I hope somebody will engage himself with that phase of this subject.

The President says that we do not get any benefit from the agricultural duties, and until recently I think that was true. But he says the prices of all these things which we export are fixed by the export demand—fixed by the world's demand. What difference does it make if we do have the duties removed from agricultural products? We will get no more for them in Canada than we would if exported to any other country in the world. If these are world products—and until recently I think most of them have been—it is idle to suggest any benefit or advantage to the American farmer by reason of free trade with Canada in order that he may enlarge or increase his exports to that country.

Ah, Senators, this arrangement can not be supported upon any course of reasoning, whether from the viewpoint that my friends upon the other side of the Chamber take, namely, a tariff for revenue only, or from the standpoint of my associates here, that a protective system shall levy duties measured by the difference between cost of production here and elsewhere. It fails no matter by what standard it is tested.

May I refer to another view that the President takes, and in this again he is right. He says that he thinks we will increase the volume of our exports of manufactures to Canada. In a degree he is right. Canada is reducing duties upon our manufactures, well, from 2½ to 6 per cent on the average, taking the different classes. I think it is true that with respect to some manufactures, providing Canada does not immediately alter her preferential arrangement with Great Britain or France or Germany, our manufacturing producers can sell over there at a little more profit than they are selling now.

I can not, however, become very enthusiastic about enlarging the profits of the manufacturers. Tell me why their profits should be enlarged? I have heard no serious complaint among the people of the United States that the profits of our manufacturers are too low. Do my friends upon the other side of this Chamber want to increase the profits of the manufacturers at the same time that they are taking away from the farmers whatever chance there may be in the future for profits in agriculture?

I think it is true that the United States Steel Corporation will be benefited by this arrangement. I think it is true that the packers of Chicago will be benefited by this arrangement. I think it is true that the millers of Minneapolis, in the State of my stalwart friend, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], will be benefited by this arrangement. I think they will not only be able to buy their raw material a trifle cheaper than they can now buy it, but in shipping the added exports to Canada they may be able to sell them at a little greater profit than they are now selling them. And we will be judged in the future by just this test. It will be said of us that we spent the special session of 1911 in the effort not to reduce the duties upon a single article that weighed heavily upon the people, but that we expended all our time and consumed all our strength to add to the already overgrown profits of the manufacturers, the combinations, and the monopolies.

I do not pretend to be a prophet, but if I can understand the language in which this arrangement is proposed, and if I can understand its application to human affairs, I can foresee the judgment of an indignant people. It will be that the special session of 1911 outran all its predecessors in the effort to add strength to those already overstrong and to deny to the weak the equal protection of the law.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat I simply desire to call his attention to a case which I have in my hand. The Senator might desire to have it noted in connection with his argument.

I find an abstract from it in Senate Document No. 29, Sixty-second Congress, first session, presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] entitled "Reciprocity Treaties—Favored Nation Clauses." It is in the last paragraph of that document.

The Senator from Iowa will see, if he has it in his hand, that it does not fully cover the point he was discussing, but it does illustrate it in a degree.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am greatly obliged to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I will state the case to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I already have it, and will inquire about it a little later on.

Mr. BACON. The case is that of Shaw & Co. et al. versus the United States.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, before proceeding with my remarks I wish to state that I am not assuming to defend the administration or to hold any commission to advocate the pending reciprocity agreement. The administration needs no defense. Whatever I may say is entirely upon my own responsibility. I yield to no one in my earnest desire for closer trade relations with the British Provinces to the north of us. I am confident that the removal of trade barriers between the United States and Canada is the ultimate destiny of the two countries. Along this border is the one place of all others where commercial wars are unprofitable. Is it not absurd and wasteful that coal should be hauled by rail or boat from Nova Scotia to localities in Ontario, while there are abundant supplies available in the United States at only a fraction of the distance, or that on our part we should exclude Canadian coal only a short distance north of Montana and Idaho for the sake of giving a market to the coal of Wyoming, which must be hauled four or five hundred miles at a freight cost of $3 to $4 per ton? This involves a waste of transportation energy which is not beneficial to either of the countries which foster such a policy.

Again, while the quantity of lumber in Canada has no doubt been greatly exaggerated, there are very large quantities available to supply part of the constantly increasing demand in the United States. The maintenance of a duty on lumber means a destructive tariff rather than a protective one. The same is true of a tariff on any commodity, the quantity of which is limited and where, as in the case of our forests, there is already a deficiency and danger that the supply in a score of years will be altogether inadequate.

REAL BASIS FOR RECIPROCITY.

The real basis for reciprocity with Canada is the proximity of two peoples of the same language, customs, habits, and needs, and what is more vital to the question under consideration, among whom the same general economic conditions exist. In their normal development, the resources as well as the activities of the two countries would supplement each other in much the same manner as those of the different States of this Union. There are States in the Union which can more readily obtain what they need from Canada; and on the other hand there are portions of Canada which can more readily obtain supplies from the United States.

Any agreement or tariff policy which we may adopt should take into account the consumer as well as the producer. It should seek to impose the least possible hardship upon each. The Senate should have no partiality either for manufacturer or farmer. In changing the existing tariff laws there should be the utmost care to avoid sudden or drastic action such as will tend to dislocate existing industries whether in the farm or in the shop. As a general policy it is best to recognize the existing regulations, and even if they seem erroneous to displace them gradually so as to avoid any undue interference with present conditions. As Republicans many of us insist upon the continuance of the protective system, though not worshiping it as a fetish and willing to remove duties when they are useless or reduce them when unnecessarily high.

BENEFITS TO BE EXPECTED.

Guided by these principles I do not see any danger lurking in the proposed reciprocity agreement with Canada. On the contrary, I anticipate very substantial benefits to both countries. Presumably trade between countries as between individuals is not characterized by transactions which give all the advantage to one party, but is for the mutual benefit of both. Trade, whether private or international, has its foundation in the ability of the one to do that which the other can not do at all, or, at least, not so well. International trade, no doubt, involves considerations of national sufficiency and defense which distinguish it from private trade; but certain general principles are common to both. In addition to the general advantages to both countries, due to their contiguity and similarity of conditions, there are special benefits which accrue to the United States by reason of the enormous growth of population and the increased demand for food and raw materials. We should by no means regard the interest of the producers of food or raw materials as subordinate to those of any other class, but in view of our phenomenal growth, not merely in population but even more in consumption, and the gradual impairment of supplies which at one time were superabundant, it is well for us, though no present danger may threaten, to wisely forecast the future and to secure as far as we may an abundance of those treasures which have furnished the basis for so much of our wonderful prosperity. The vital fact of world-wide application is the pressure of increasing population and consumption upon the products of the farm and upon certain materials essential for the support of life and the continued development of our present-day civilization.

Mr. President, this tendency is not confined to our own borders, it is world-wide. It may be easy to enlarge manufacturing plants and increase their output if there be a sufficient supply of raw material, but when the food supply is diminished because population shifts from country to the city, and the average citizen consumes more, a condition is created which must awaken our most earnest attention.

I am far from advocating the cause of the manufacturer as against the farmer. I represent in part a constituency which has a larger number of farmers, with possibly one exception, than live in any State whose Senators have expressed themselves for or against this agreement. But it should be our endeavor, everyone of us, to recognize great essential facts which govern and shape the economic situation. Most important of these is the necessity for so forecasting the future that the food supply of the people may never become scanty.

EFFECT OF TARIFF DUTIES UPON FARM PRODUCTS.

In this discussion the one question which in importance transcends all others is the future food supply of the United States. It has been practically conceded in tariff discussions in the past that the duties imposed upon wheat, corn—in fact, those upon nearly all agricultural products except wool and sugar, which are not affected by this proposed agreement—do not increase the price of these commodities. True, in localities of limited area near to the border of Canada or of Mexico, or in regions where the distances from the sources of domestic supply are such that transportation from foreign countries is easier than from the United States, prices have been sustained by tariff rates. Again, in years of inferior crops the tariff exerts an influence upon the price of any product; in brief, at all times, duties have a slight steadying influence. Still further, the tariff on agricultural products may be said to give a certain degree of confidence to farmers, a factor which is by no means unimportant when we consider that men in every form of enterprise desire a tariff, whether needed or not, for the more or less imaginary reason that protection gives life and prosperity to the business in which they are engaged.

The absence of any material effect of tariffs upon agricultural prices has been repeatedly recognized. No longer ago than in the tariff discussion of 1909 the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], on May 31 of that year, stated:

> The protective duty on wheat up to this time has been of no earthly value to the wheat farmers. * * * We have been an exporter of wheat, and are yet; and as long as we export wheat the price is fixed by the Liverpool price. * * * I expect to get 30 cents a bushel more for my wheat than I have ever gotten before.

The Senator from Minnesota also said on the same day:

> The farmers sell their hogs and pigs to the Beef Trust at Chicago and Kansas City, and it is a protection to them—that is, the Beef Trust—rather than the farmers.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] also stated in the debate on the Payne-Aldrich bill that "the only benefit which the agriculturist received from the tariff was the duty on wool and that on barley, except an indirect, roundabout benefit which he takes from feeding the people employed in protected manufactories."

In the early discussion of the proposed pact with Canada there was a protest, amounting to an outcry in some quarters, based on the idea that the adoption of the agreement would reduce the profits obtained by the farmers. While this claim is still made on behalf of specific localities and of certain products, like flaxseed and barley, the general ground of opposition has shifted, and it is now maintained not that the agreement will confer a present injury upon the farmers, but that in the future it will lower the prices which they will receive.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] points out that at the present rate of increase in population and consumption of wheat the domestic supply will be consumed at home after the year 1918, and he argues that for this reason duties should be retained on farm products so that at that time the price may be raised and the farmers especially benefited.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], as I understood him—I have not yet seen the printed report of his remarks—stated, a few days ago, that when he, as governor, transmitted his message to the legislature in 1904 favoring reciprocal relations with Canada, the conditions were different from those now existing. I judge he means that the proportion of agricultural products exported is less and that the domestic demand is for a larger share of the supply.

Let us for a minute analyze this contention, namely, that in the case of the majority of agricultural products the tariff does not now increase the price received by the farmer, but that within a decade the demand at home will increase so much more rapidly than the home supply that prices will be materially increased. What is this but a demand for increased protection on food products? It is practically conceded that under the conditions which now prevail, and have prevailed for years, duties have not been necessary for the farmer's prosperity, and have not raised the prices of his products, but under the changed conditions which will occur in the future these same duties will increase the price and afford a degree of protection not now enjoyed.

That is, these duties were imposed when their sole effect was at most a steadying influence or a benefit to a few localities or to a very limited number of producers. They were adopted as a part of our protective system. But now it is argued that although these duties on farm products have not caused any material rise in price, yet when conditions change and the domestic demand overtakes the domestic supply they will raise prices, and for this reason should be retained.

As against this contention, Mr. President, I have listened for years to the argument that a tariff does not ultimately raise prices. Numerous examples are given where a domestic industry has been established because of the assistance of tariff duties. As a result two sources of supply come to compete for the market which before was occupied by one. Thus the ingenuity of the American inventor and the effect of competition with establishments abroad have materially lowered prices in many cases.

You can examine all tariff schedules and hardly select an article—save where the tariff is one of a revenue nature, or in which the domestic supply is but a part of the domestic consumption—where the consumer pays the foreign price increased by the duty. The reason is that we have built up within this magnificent empire of ours competing supplies of these articles.

But in this special session of 1911 we hear the argument that certain tariffs on agricultural products are of vital importance in order to secure the future price when the supply falls below the domestic demand. If the local supply is unequal to the demand the inevitable result would be a very large increase in price beyond that which would otherwise exist.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Maine in the chair). Will the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Why would not the same principle which applies to the increasing of manufacturing establishments, and therefore the increasing of competition, apply to the increasing of the number of farms, and thereby competition in the production of farm products, so long as only about half of our agricultural lands are under cultivation?

Mr. BURTON. In some slight measure it does, but the Senator from Idaho will recognize the very vital difference between the two. The opening up of new lands and the recruiting of farmers to occupy them must necessarily be gradual. The same method of invention and of multiplication of products does not apply to the products of the farm as to those of the factory.

Mr. BORAH. Then, again, I quote to the Senator from Ohio a statement showing that about one-half of all the lands in private ownership are not under cultivation.

Mr. BURTON. But I am sure that my friend will recognize that it is the best half that is already utilized and under cultivation.

Mr. BORAH. It is the best half at the present time, because of the fact that as soon as the farm lands have become exhausted—as the saying is, "skinned"—the parties have moved to other agricultural lands which were richer and more profitable. But it is nevertheless true that within the last seven or eight years there has been immigration back to the abandoned farms, to the replenishment of farms.

Mr. BURTON. However, the increase from the occupation of abandoned farms does not at all keep pace with the increase in consumption. I shall have something to say upon that later. But how can the advocate of lower duties support the proposition that tariffs should be retained in order to raise prices in the future?

NATIONAL GREATNESS DEPENDS UPON ABUNDANT FOOD SUPPLY.

I take the broad ground, Mr. President, that this Nation can not maintain its present proud position without an abundant supply of the primary necessities of life, especially of the essential articles of food which we eat. The halcyon days of the past have been characterized by enormous supplies of agricultural produce. We were, first of all, an agricultural people. In the history of nations there has been no more distinctive mark of prosperity and of greatness than the possession of or ready access to the necessities of life, especially in the form of food. These promote not merely their economic development, but their power and prosperity. An insufficiency or expensive supply of food hinders development in industrial and other lines, and also, in addition to these results, it affects the physical type, diminishes efficiency for military service or for the more important conquest of nature. Again, it creates discontent. Starvation and riot go hand in hand. There are numerous illustrations of the policy of nations in this regard. Athens or Attica in the last half of the fourth century before the Christian era imported 12,000,000 or 15,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum. A public regulation provided that any ship owned in Athens or subsidized by the Government of Attica on its return voyage must bring a certain amount of grain. Demosthenes in one of his orations mentions the fact that a ship taking a voyage from the Crimean Peninsula, where wheat was abundant, to Athens was forbidden to discharge even the least portion of its cargo at any way port on the route, and a violation of this regulation might be punished with death.

In Rome, after the second Punic War, there followed a scarcity of grain, and at times the sale of wheat was under governmental control, as was the uniform policy in Athens. At other times large supplies were obtained and either sold at low prices or positively given away to the populace.

Passing by many other instances of the insistence of a people upon maintaining its grain supply, we may come to England, where in 1846 Sir Robert Peel turned his back on the policies of a lifetime and brought into Parliament a measure for the repeal of the corn laws, which opened the markets of England to the food supply of the world. This law became fully effective in the year 1849.

There are certain articles of food which may be classed as luxuries which are not of such vital importance, but if the time is coming in the United States when, instead of cheaper food, the cost will exceed that in other countries, we must count on a revolutionary change which will not merely affect our industrial situation, but will affect our political situation as well. Therefore I desire now to enter my protest against any policy which looks to the maintenance of duties on the most essential foods—the bread and the meat which the people eat—when the home supply shall prove insufficient. Such a policy, to my mind, is little short of suicidal. Progress and prosperity alike are impossible without an abundant food supply.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks this measure will lower the price of meat and bread, in view of the duty that is left upon those articles and the manner in which they reach the people—that is, through trusts and combines?

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator from Idaho refer to the Canadian reciprocity agreement?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I think it may to some extent. I have some material here that will possibly answer the Senator's question more fully. The benefit of higher prices has not inured exclusively to the good of the farmer in the past few years, but I think the settlement of that question lies in a different direction.

Mr. BORAH. If this was designed for the purpose of lowering the price of meat and lowering the price of bread, why were not those articles put on the free list?

Mr. BURTON. Because the Canadian commissioners did not desire to have it done.

Mr. BORAH. And we did not get it.

Mr. BURTON. We did not get it. We took the agreement which would be accepted by the other side, recognizing the fact that it requires two to make a bargain. The butchers and packers of Canada did not think that they could compete with the highly organized packing concerns of this country. I am not in their confidence, but I fancy that was their reason.

Mr. BORAH. And the butchers and packers of the United States did not think that they wanted to compete?

Mr. BURTON. Whatever their thought might have been on the subject, I am satisfied this agreement would have come to us with meat reciprocally free between the two countries if it had not been for the attitude of Canada on that point.

Mr. BORAH. All we know for sure is that it did not.

Mr. BURTON. It did not come to us with provision for free meats, but there were very material reductions on bacon and other varieties of animal food, as the Senator knows.

It is not the intention of this proposal for reciprocity to reduce the price of articles sold by the farmer. It would require resort to vague conjecture to prove that the farmer will suffer from this agreement, save in exceptional instances. The price of flax and barley may be slightly diminished. In some localities near the Canadian border hay and possibly wheat and other products may show some decrease in price, but in all our deliberations it is the whole country and the general good of all the people to which we must look for our mandate in legislation. The slight loss, and it can only be slight, of producers of particular articles and in specific localities is overbalanced by the substantial benefits which will be conferred upon the whole people.

PRICE OF WHEAT WILL NOT BE LOWERED.

One fallacy which has received strong support in the debates upon this proposition is the claim that when prices are lower in a contiguous country free interchange will result in a fall to the same level of prices in the larger country across the boundary line. But quite to the contrary, in such cases there is an inevitable tendency toward an average of prices determined by the relative supply in the two countries. Take, for example, the case of wheat. The production in Canada for the year 1910 was 150,000,000 bushels; the United States produced 737,000,000 bushels, or very nearly five times as much. The aggregate production of the two countries is an essential part of the world's supply, nearly one-third of the world's entire production. The removal of the barriers between the two countries must mean a like scale of prices in the two countries. If the Canadian price is lower, it will rise very nearly in the inverse proportion which it bears to the total product of the two countries—five-sixths in the United States and one-sixth in Canada. That is, if wheat is 12 cents higher in the United States than in Canada, her price will be increased five-sixths of the difference, or 10 cents, while ours will be lowered only one-sixth, or 2 cents.

However, there is another fact to be considered. Both are exporting countries; and while all may not be willing to accept the dictum that the price of wheat is determined by the market quotations of Liverpool, it is determined by the relative demand and supply, as modified by the available means for transportation. We overlook the fact that in every year the United States has been a large exporter of wheat, and we can reach no conclusion except that this condition will continue for a considerable time. The smallest export was in the year beginning July 1, 1904, when the quantity fell to 44,000,000 bushels. In only two other years—those beginning July 1, 1905 and 1909—has the export fallen below 100,000,000 bushels, and in 1901 it reached the enormous quantity of 234,000,000 bushels. In only 1 year for more than 30 years have the imports in grain less the reexports exceeded 1,000,000 bushels.

One very important fact which has been overlooked in this discussion is that exports of agricultural produce from Canada go now almost exclusively to Great Britain, whereas, with few exceptions, until the year 1892 the exports of agricultural produce from Canada to the United States were greater than to Great Britain. But since that date the percentage of exports to Great Britain has increased at a rapid rate, until for the four years ending in 1909 the average value per year was twelve and one-fourth times the exports to the United States.

I give this and certain other tables, and I ask consent to have them printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BURTON. The following table shows the average annual movement by quinquennial periods to the United States and Great Britain:

Exports of agricultural products from Canada.

Dates.	To Great Britain.	To United States.	Total to all countries.
1871–1875	$6,671,196	$7,447,890	$15,015,331
1876–1880	9,348,915	8,687,568	19,352,117
1881–1885	7,940,534	11,341,045	24,407,739
1886–1890	5,759,239	8,734,096	15,447,503
1891–1895	11,734,535	4,498,334	18,245,282
1896–1900	18,185,661	1,955,339	23,119,763
1901–1905	25,133,710	3,650,626	34,738,304
1906–1909 [1]	46,658,062	3,811,959	56,996,525

[1] Includes only four years and nine months for 1907.

I will read a few of the figures. In the five years from 1871 to 1875 the average annual exports of agricultural products from Canada to Great Britain were $6,671,000; to the United States, $7,447,000. From 1881 to 1885 the annual exports to the United States averaged considerably more than to Great Britain. The same is true of the period from 1886 to 1890, but in the last four years, from 1906 to 1909, the exports to Great Britain averaged more than $46,600,000 annually, while to our own country the average was only about $3,800,000.

Now, what does this table show? Because the lines of communication between Canada and Great Britain are now quite abundant and the prices abroad are higher, the trend in the exports of agricultural products is more and more from Canada to the mother country. We are also large exporters of agricultural products to Great Britain in competition with Canada. So any imagination, I was about to say, any foreboding, that in this year or for years to come, indeed, at any time, there will be such a dumping of Canadian agricultural products into the United States as to injure the American farmer is entirely without foundation. To be sure, her wheat production is increasing rapidly, while ours is gradually approaching the maximum. But in spite of this fact the Canadian production will not equal ours for many years to come. In the past nine years the average wheat crop of Canada has increased 35 per cent, or about 4 per cent per annum.

That is in line with what I have already stated in response to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Agricultural production does not increase in such a manner as to derange markets in one year. It is only when a demand which has the semblance at least of permanency arises or when there is a decreased supply from sources from which supplies have been previously derived that great increases in agricultural products have come. The rate of increase in the future will be largely determined by the world's demand. What is the trend of these demands? Nothing has more clearly proven the improved conditions of all classes of society in the more progressive countries than the increased per capita consumption of cereals in the last 25 years.

I wish to call attention to the world-wide demand for wheat. I regret that I have not had time to make a comparison of the growth of food products other than wheat. At some later time I may present some considerations upon this subject to the Senate.

A comparison of the consumption of wheat and other cereals by quinquennial periods for 20 years, from 1886 to 1905, shows a steady increase in the consumption of wheat in all the more advanced European nations, with more irregular and less significant increases in the consumption of other cereals. A comparison of the period from 1886 to 1890 with that from 1901 to 1905 shows an increase in all European countries in the consumption of wheat except France, Greece, Portugal, Servia, and Turkey, while in most countries the increase is very considerable, as, for example, 58 per cent in Russia and 31.2 in Germany. The decrease in France is comparatively slight, and is explained in part by the fact that that country shows the maximum per capita consumption, which fell from 8.98 in the first period to 8.61 in the last period named. In Greece the decrease was from 5.49 to 5.35.

The consumption of rye, the yield of which is greater than that of wheat in Denmark, Finland, Germany, the Netherlands, Russia, and Sweden, also shows an increase in most countries, though where the consumption is largest there is a notable decrease along with an increase in the consumption of wheat. All the countries which manifest an increase in the consumption of wheat also display an increase in the combined consumption of wheat and rye, with the single exception of Bulgaria. It is to be noted that in Russia, Sweden, Finland, and some other European countries rye is the staple for bread rather than wheat.

The following table shows the per capita consumption of wheat and other cereals in different European countries from 1886 to 1905:

Per capita consumption of grain in European countries, 1886–1905, including seed, quantities consumed as human and animal food, and used for industrial purposes.

Mr. BURTON. What, then, is true of the outlook for the American farmer? That the demand is increasing so much more rapidly than the supply that his prices are sure to rise. There is no more favorable prospect in any occupation than in that of the farmer. The movement from the country to the city is manifest all over the civilized world. In Germany recent figures show there has been an increase of from 3 per cent to 20 per cent living in cities of over 100,000 population in the last 50 years. France, England, and Russia show the same tendency.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. When Germany found that the emigration was from the farm to the city and that agriculture was languishing, she put a tariff upon her farm products and turned the emigration back from the city to the farm, and agriculture revived.

Mr. BURTON. The tariff was not the substantial cause.

Mr. BORAH. It had a great part to do with it, and the tariffs are still maintained.

Mr. BURTON. That question has been very much discussed in Germany. Down to about 1878 and 1879 the tendency was toward low duties, at which time there prevailed a school of public men, headed by Bismarck, and supported by some political economists. They maintained that national sufficiency was essential, and that at some time Germany might be cut off from foreign sources of supply by military blockades. All their calculations have possible wars in view. They consider it essential that a supply of food shall always be available within their own country.

Then, again, they argued that although Germany was making great progress in manufacturing, nevertheless other countries by unfriendly tariffs might prevent the admission of their products.

They rejected the proposition of the theoretical free traders that every country is best fitted to pursue certain branches of production and should devote its efforts in that direction, while depending upon other countries for a supply of articles for the production of which it has less favorable opportunities. They concluded, accordingly, to adopt a policy which would aid in securing a food supply within their own borders.

There is no denying that an agrarian party in Germany, as in France, had a great deal to do with these higher duties. Further, the increase in agricultural products in Germany, I think I am safe in saying, is not due to a movement back to the farm, but rather to the great improvements they have made in agriculture. Their yield per acre of wheat and oats and other farm products is very considerably more than it was 10 or 20 years ago.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Is it not a fact, however, that this increase in production and the increase of immigration from the city to the farm was contemporaneous or progressed along with the rise of duties upon farm products by the German Government?

Mr. BURTON. In some degree it was due to that. There is a further point, the Germans are in an entirely different situation from what we are. They have a limited area of farm property compared with ours. They have not the magnificent opportunity in farming that we have.

Mr. BORAH. If we had a limited area I could see much reason for supporting this reciprocity agreement, but so long as we have an unlimited area, or, at least, millions of acres uncultivated, it seems to me there is the more reason why we should foster agriculture within our own borders and should encourage and protect the agriculturist.

Mr. BURTON. I must differ with my friend from Idaho on this point. We have an unlimited variety of climate and of fertile soil, and if we can not succeed in agriculture we can succeed in nothing. What is the object of a duty? What is the object of so-called protection? It is not to put a duty on every article so that A, B, C, D, and E, and so on to the end of the list, can come to Congress and demand protection. It is, rather, to build up a harmonious civilization, imposing no duties on commodities which need no protection or where they would result in monopoly prices. I want to say, and I shall show a little later, that I do not mean by this that any hasty action should be taken in regard to agricultural duties. The farmer is just as much entitled to consideration as is anyone else, and in some cases protective duties might with justice be retained on agricultural products.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I understand that the Senator from Ohio now takes the position that protection of farm products is undesirable and unnecessary?

Mr. BURTON. I have not said that. I have just said that I would not say that. What I do say is that the necessity for protection to the farmer is less, and that that necessity is fast disappearing because of the pressure of population and consumption on production, a factor in evidence the world over.

Mr. REED. May I ask if the Senator believes that the present protective duty on farm products does raise their price above what it naturally would be?

Mr. BURTON. I have already answered that question, but I have no objection to answering it again. On certain products, yes, as in the case of wool, sugar, of course, and, probably, flaxseed and barley. It also raises the price at certain seasons when there is a scarcity and in specific localities where a competing supply is available across the border, which could readily be brought in, as in the case perhaps of hay in New Hampshire or in Vermont.

Mr. REED. I understand—and I do not want to press this further than to get the point—I understand the Senator now maintains that a further continuance of that tariff is not justifiable?

Mr. BURTON. No; I have not said that, either. I will repeat what I said, namely—that the reason for it is diminishing because of the increase in the demand for the farmer's products out of proportion to the supply. It is partly a social problem, due to the shifting of population from the country to the city.

Mr. REED. I wanted simply to get the Senator's view, that is, whether if reciprocity does affect these prices the bill should nevertheless be passed?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly, I take that ground. I should say yes, but I point out at the same time the fact that I do not believe the passage of the bill would materially change prices.

Mr. REED. So that if the tariff ever did materially increase prices of agricultural products and if it does now materially increase such prices, it should nevertheless be wiped out?

Mr. BURTON. I would say that as a general proposition, but I am stating only my personal opinion, of course, and that includes exceptions.

Mr. REED. And the reason for wiping it out now, after having maintained it all these years, lies in the fact that there is a greater home demand for farm products to-day?

Mr. BURTON. That is the main reason. I should state also that conditions are changing.

Mr. REED. Does that not bring us, then, to this proposition, that as soon as conditions have reached the point where the farmer is really to realize a substantial benefit he is to have that withdrawn from him?

Mr. BURTON. It takes from him that which he never had.

Mr. REED. That which he never had. That was my position, that he never did have any protection.

Mr. BURTON. Except to the extent that I have indicated. Of course, I think I have made it clear already that the duty on agricultural products has, under certain circumstances in certain categories and localities, influenced the price.

Mr. REED. But it has been temporary.

Mr. BURTON. No; not temporary, for instance, take wool. Certainly the influence on the price has not been temporary as regards sugar either. One of the points I am seeking to make is the change in the relation between agricultural products, food, primary necessities of life, and other commodities.

Mr. REED. To follow this matter one moment further—and I beg the Senator's pardon——

Mr. BURTON. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Is not clothing a necessity of life?

Mr. BURTON. I anticipated that question. Yes, it is a necessity of life, but not to the same degree as food. There is an almost unlimited variety in the texture and cost of clothing. It can be made serviceable for a longer or shorter time by repair and is largely a matter of taste. There are some who unfortunately must be satisfied with inferior garments as well as inferior food. There is a very wide distinction.

Mr. REED. That is to say we can patch our clothing and get along with a high tariff on clothing.

Mr. BURTON. I would not say that. I would say, that it is not an elementary necessity to the same degree that bread and meat are.

Mr. REED. Not just at this season of the year, I agree, but at other seasons. I want, with the Senator's permission, to make this statement which I started to make, lest I should be misunderstood by the form of my question——

Mr. BURTON. I want to say one thing further about clothing, if the Senator will pardon me. Of course I would be far from advocating the idea that we should foster or allow any policy that would cause people to be poorly clad.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. BURTON. The fact is, however, that by the use of substitutes and in very essential varieties of woolens themselves the difference between the cost here and abroad by no means equals the rate of duties imposed, but I presume I can join the Senator from Missouri in saying that I regard the duties on certain fabrics as now very high.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me now to make the statement I started to make?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I do not want to be misunderstood by the form of my questions as advocating tariff duties on farm products. The Democratic Party has always maintained that those duties were mere frauds and subterfuges, and I think our policy is very fully vindicated by the speech of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. No; I would not go so far as to say that they are a fraud. I will come later to some features of the tariff which are beneficial to the farmer.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. In this colloquy the matter of clothing has come up with relation to the farmer's product of wool. I should like to ask the Senator whether he considers the duty on clothing a matter of protection to the grower of wool so much as it is to those who manufacture the clothing? I should like to get his idea of the proportion of money that goes into the wool of the farmer and into the suit of clothes when finally completed and ready for wearing.

Mr. BURTON. I would not be able offhand to state any proportion between the two. Of course the Senator from Wyoming knows of the adoption of the ratio in 1866 or 1867 by which 4 pounds of wool in the grease were regarded as the equivalent of 1 pound of cloth. That has become a sort of sacred ratio, but whether it is correct or not I do not know.

Mr. WARREN. We might get at it in another way. I assert—and I think without fear of contradiction—that there is not a suit of clothes in this room the cloth of which cost $6 at wholesale from the manufacturer. We all know what we pay to the tailors for clothes, so that the price of the finished cloth sold at the factory at wholesale covers all that the manufacturer and the woolgrower get, and the difference between three, four, five, or six dollars, the price of the cloth, and the thirty-five to fifty dollars, the price of the suit of clothes, is not chargeable to the farmer and the woolen manufacturer.

Mr. BURTON. There are a number of tollgates, Mr. President, all along the line between the producer and the consumer, and by no means are all of them at the customhouse. I wish to say one thing in regard to the matter of clothing. I think it is but fair to say, in regard to our present system of duties on clothing, that there are no people in the world so well clad as those of the United States, no people so comfortably clad as those who live within our own borders, so that this system certainly can not be guilty of the enormities which many ascribe to it.

I was speaking, when interrupted, of the disproportionate growth of urban populations in European countries. It is unnecessary to dwell upon conditions in the United States, because they are too well known to all. Added to this fact is another important feature in the situation, that while invention has exerted its helpful effect in the production of grain, as in improved thrashers, reapers, seeders, improved mechanism has accomplished much more in multiplying articles of manufacture.

Prominent writers on political economy have accepted the generalization that the price of manufactured products will diminish, while those of agricultural products will increase. Mr. John Stuart Mill, in his work written years ago, accepts this generalization with some qualifications.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me once more?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. REED. If it be true that the machinery used by the manufacturer is increasing its power so much more rapidly than the machinery of the farmer, does that not argue that we are really protecting the machinery of the manufacturers to-day, and that that is one of the places at least where the cut in the tariff ought to be severest?

Mr. BURTON. Not necessarily, because the foreign competitor has the same advantage of that machinery, modified somewhat in the case where our own ingenuity gives us the advantage. The foreign competitor has also the advantage of very much cheaper labor.

Mr. REED. But the greater the capacity of the machinery the less the proportion of manual labor. Therefore, does it not appear that the tariff ought to be reduced?

Mr. BURTON. The vital difference between the two is that competition is sharper in the case of the manufactures than it is in the case of agriculture. Competition barely exists in the case of agriculture, but it is acute and growing in the case of most manufactures.

Mr. REED. But there can be none when there is a 90 or 125 or 150 per cent tariff duty.

Mr. BURTON. There is no such tariff as that unless there is a tariff also on the raw material.

The substantial advantage to the farmers of the United States from the tariff has not been derived from duties imposed directly upon their products, but rather from the growth of an enormous industrial population and the multitude of professional and other classes dependent upon that industrial population for most of their food.

By the census for the year 1905 the number of persons employed in the manufacturing industries was 7,085,000, and the total wages paid in that year—1905—were $2,611,000,000. A large share of these wages go to purchase the products of the farmer. As a result the share of the farmers' products which has been exported has been constantly diminishing. The percentage of the total food export to all exports fell from 55.77 in 1880 to 21.59 in 1910, a fall in 30 years from 55 per cent to 21 per cent. There was also a fall in the value of foodstuffs exported from $459,000,000 in 1880 to $369,000,000 in 1910.

Mr. President, I have here tables showing the proportion of exports of agricultural products to the total exports; the exports of wheat; the exports of fresh beef; and exports of live cattle, which I ask unanimous consent may be printed in the RECORD. I shall not now detain the Senate to read them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to insert the tables referred to by the Senator is granted.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Exports of foodstuffs.

Dates.	Value.	Per cent of foodstuff exports to total exports.
1880	$459,000,000	55.77
1890	357,000,000	42.21
1900	545,000,000	39.80
1910	369,000,000	21.59

Mr. BURTON. The principal loss in the export of food products has occurred in breadstuffs and meats, as the following tables show:

Exports of wheat.

Dates.	Total bushels.	Bushels to United Kingdom.
1908	100,000,000	44,000,000
1909	67,000,000	24,500,000
1910	46,500,000	22,333,000

Exports of fresh beef mostly to United Kingdom.

1908	$201,000,000
1909	123,000,000
1910	75,750,000

Exports of live cattle.

Dates.	Value.	Number.
1908	$20,333,000	349,210
1909	18,000,000	207,542
1910	12,200,000	139,430

Mr. President, what was the reason for the depression in agriculture between 1890 and 1900? No one cause occasioned the diminished prices which the farmer received, but to one reason more than to any other may be ascribed the condition of that day, and that was the depression in manufactures.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon, but what caused the depression in manufactures?

Mr. BURTON. The depression in manufacturing was, in turn, intensified by the lack of demand from the farmer. The sale of the farmer's products was very greatly diminished by the fact that the manufacturing population were able to buy from him only in diminished quantities.

Mr. WARREN. As a matter of fact, were not our manufacturers crippled by the manufactures of other countries being allowed to come in, causing our workmen to be idle and unable to buy the products of the farmer, and, consequently, the products of the farm lay on the market without purchasers?

Mr. BURTON. One great reason of the depression beginning in 1893 was the lack of confidence as to the future. Our business calculations and our business activity depend very largely on preparation for the future. There are two classes of expenditures of capital and of activity in any year—one for the maintenance of existing operations, which may be increased or diminished, and the other in providing for future growth. The first is illustrated by a factory which continues to be operated in the ordinary way, while the second is illustrated by the construction of a new factory to provide for increased output. After the election in 1892 this second form of enterprise, provision for enlargement in the future, came to an absolute standstill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to see if I understood the Senator from Ohio, of whose intellectual integrity I have the highest opinion. Does the Senator from Ohio say that the industrial and agricultural depression began in 1893?

Mr. BURTON. It did; certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A moment ago I understood the Senator from Ohio to say, what I think is the historical fact, that that depression began in 1890.

Mr. BURTON. Let me quote to the Senator from Mississippi something from Dun's Mercantile Register, which is a paper of acknowledged authority.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not a fact that this depression did begin in 1890? Did it not begin on the failure of the Baring Bros.? Did it not abound around the world, and was that depression confined to the United States?

Mr. BURTON. I could almost say that the failure of Baring Bros. did not exert the influence of a flyspeck in the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was the depression which existed in the United States confined to the United States?

Mr. BURTON. There was more or less disarrangement in some foreign countries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did it not exist in very extreme form in Australia?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; but we were immune from that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And did it not exist earlier there than it existed here?

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Mississippi will give me a chance to answer——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One more question, and I will then ask the Senator from Ohio to answer them all at once, for they are all parts of the same question. Is it not, in his opinion, a fact that at that time we were in a stage of agricultural progress when production was temporarily outrunning consumption, whereas now we are in a stage where consumption seems threatening to outrun production?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so. We had an enormous export of wheat early in the nineties. It is true there was something of a disturbance by reason of the Baring failure, but, as stated by one writer of high authority, "even in London the effect of the failure did not reach beyond Capel Court." Regarding the question of when the depression began, I wish to quote to the Senator from Dun's Mercantile Register, which will be taken by all as an authority. I think I can give the exact words. In the publication on the final day of the year 1892 these words are used:

> The most prosperous year in the history of business in the United States is now drawing to a close, with strongly favorable indications for the future.

There was no sign of depression in the United States, whatever there may have been in Australia or other countries of the world, until the threat of overturning the whole business system of the country performed its fatal work along in 1893. I have even heard the argument made that as the Wilson law did not pass until 1894 it was a mistake to attribute the business depression in 1893 to that cause. People who are suffering from a fatal disease are in a mood other than cheerful for a long time before they come to their death beds. When the people of this country knew, as they did in 1893, that there might be a radical change in our whole industrial system, no man was willing to invest his money in the enlargement of any enterprise. The wheels of industry stopped then and there. I do not say that was the sole cause, but it was a cause of the utmost importance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not a fact that 1890 was the year when Gen. Weaver, of Iowa, was going all over the Union calamity howling, and when he boasted that he no longer counted his audiences by the thousand, but that he counted them by the acre, and when the greatest appeal ever made to these people was made on account of the hard times amongst the cotton and the wheat planters and corn planters especially? I want to ask the Senator, also, if he does not object, to go back and get the price of corn in 1890 as quoted by the writers of statistics, and if he can do so before he publishes his speech to put the figures in his speech.

Mr. BURTON. As regards the speakers who go about with the so-called calamity howl, to which the Senator from Mississippi has referred, I do not attach any very great seriousness to them. Sometimes they are noisiest and most blatant at the very time the people are best off, and when they themselves are best off, too.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true; in that I agree with the Senator from Ohio; but when that is the case the calamity howl is not responded to. That, however, was the year of the birth and the remarkable increase of the vote of the Populist Party throughout the West, from 1890 to 1891, following it up in 1892 and 1893.

Mr. BURTON. That was in a very large measure due to what was called the warehouse-receipts proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The subtreasury scheme.

Mr. BURTON. The subtreasury scheme and that sort of thing. I think it was very little, if any, indication of depression, though the calamity howl of which the Senator speaks has always been the stock in trade of the Populist Party and not infrequently of the Democratic Party.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. Was it not in the autumn of the year 1890 that Secretary Rusk, of the Agricultural Department, issued his bulletin in which he pointed out that corn had become an excellent article of fuel in Nebraska?

Mr. BURTON. It may be; but I do not recall any bulletin of the kind. I fancy the object of the Senator from Indiana is to show that at one time a bulletin was issued in which a Republican official made the suggestion that corn was an excellent article of fuel. I do not want to indulge in any partisan recrimination, but it is not merely in one bulletin or at one time that corn has been regarded as an excellent article of fuel, there have been whole years of Democratic domination when corn was very much used for fuel.

Mr. SHIVELY. No. But even at that, likewise of Republican domination, I presume the Senator admits.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so.

Mr. SHIVELY. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. The McKinley Act, of course, went on the statute book in 1890. Does not the Senator from Ohio now distinctly remember that the universal announcement across the counters of our merchants throughout the United States was an increase of prices on the manufactured goods on their shelves? Did not that act result in an unbalancing of the proportions between production and consumption?

Mr. BURTON. I presume prices in some instances were increased; but I do not think it was serious enough to in any appreciable manner injure the course of production. It is not an unusual thing for dealers to raise prices after the passage of a tariff bill. It is possible the Senator himself may have had the experience that I have had of having a dealer say to me that the price of shoes was raised because of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and that, too, in the face of the fact that the recent tariff act provided for a reduction from the rates of 25 per cent carried in the Dingley bill to 15 or 10 per cent. In most of those duties the reduction was to 10 per cent, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. That was true as to most of them.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator is measurably right in that respect; that is to say, that merchants frequently do avail themselves of a new tariff law to write up the prices of articles that are not in themselves affected by the tariff; but is not that a vice that always follows from the projection of the taxing power into the private enterprises of the country?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so. In a measure, or to some persons, the taxing power, whether internal-revenue taxation or tariff taxation, brings prosperity because of the increased price of articles in the hands of the retail and the wholesale merchant.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. It is a notable fact, as the Senator from Indiana has stated, that merchants have taken advantage and undertaken to push up prices after the passage of a tariff bill on items that were not in any manner affected by the bill. For instance, after the Payne-Aldrich bill it was circulated broadcast all over this country by the ready-made clothing men that clothing would cost from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 a year more because of the Payne-Aldrich bill, which, as a matter of fact, did not raise a single item connected with wool or with clothing, but, on the contrary, made two reductions. But I will ask the Senator whether we are not liable, if we should to-day drop the customs-tariff law off our books and make it free trade, to have the same merchants, who are always looking out for the dollar, raise the prices because they would say this article or that would no longer be manufactured?

Mr. BURTON. I think there is that possibility. If I had time, I would go at length into the question of the possible reduction of prices by reason of the removal of tariff duties. I am not optimistic that any marked reductions would result. For instance, in some products our consumption is more than half of that of the whole world. Suppose one-half of the quantity consumed in this country is made here. Suppose, again, you tear down the tariff barriers and destroy or greatly impair the manufacture of the share of such a product made in this country. What would be the inevitable result? The foreign producers would very likely raise their prices above the level which existed in the United States before the duty was removed. In brief, you can not accomplish any considerable dislocation of trade arrangements of this kind without some sort of penalty resulting from it.

Mr. REED. Will that not be true of this bill the same as of others?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so. The supply is so much greater in our own country than in Canada that there would be little disturbance of trade.

I have already quoted the figures for wheat——

Mr. REED. I am speaking generally of the entire bill. If every time you interfere you must pay the penalty, we will have to pay it in this instance; will we not?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so; because the dislocation, as I call it, will be so slight. A year from now I do not believe anyone will care to refer to his arguments against this reciprocity bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the Statistical Abstract of the United States showing the price of corn in 1890. In 1890 the price was 50.6 cents per bushel; in 1891, 40.6; in 1892, 39.4; in 1893, 36.5; in 1895, 25.3; in 1896, 21.5; and in 1897, 26.3.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait. Do not close up that book for a minute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That contradicts nothing that I thought. I knew that the prices kept decreasing more and more after that. Now, what was the price in 1889, 1888, and 1887? Read that.

Mr. SMOOT. Eighteen hundred and eighty-seven is 44.4, and 1888 is 34.1.

Mr. WARREN. From 1890 to 1892 it was very high.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the estimated average of the corn crop of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. Had I anticipated a discussion of the corn prices around about 1893, I should have given attention to them and endeavored to form some generalizations from those statistics.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I say just at this point that my memory is that, so far as farm products are concerned, from 1890 to 1892 was a very prosperous term, and the prices were good.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I only want to suggest, in connection with this discussion of low prices of farm products, that at the time they were so low most of the Republican leaders were going about the country insisting that the tariff protected the farmer.

Mr. BURTON. There was not a large importation of farm products from abroad at that time; hardly any, in fact.

I do not wish to disagree with any Republican leader anywhere, but I should hardly feel that I could accept his statements regarding the importation of the products of the farm for that period. Of course the decrease of home demand was an important factor.

Mr. BORAH. It is true that in the Wilson bill they put upon the free list many of the articles which are covered by the agreement between this country and Canada, and it is true that the Republican Party as an organization denounced that act.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no doubt, and very properly.

Mr. BORAH. And claimed that the tariff benefited and protected the farmer, although at that time he was not in a position to be benefited as much as now.

But now, just when we are approaching the time when it is conceded by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York, and all others who have discussed this question, that the farmer is to realize for the first time in a direct and substantial way, we get ready to take the tariff from his products.

Mr. BURTON. I think I can show the Senator from Idaho that the farmer has already realized, and I have before me some figures on that subject right now.

Just a word about the Wilson bill. The farmer was injured by that measure because there was a kind of paralysis in the whole country, the industrial portion as well as the farming portion. I am not at this minute arguing so much against the Wilson bill as a tariff measure as I am against sudden drastic changes which never ought to be attempted in any country. You can not go along for years with a certain fiscal policy, as to tariffs and kindred subjects, and then change it overnight, change it radically, without not only some persons, but everybody being hurt by it.

Mr. BORAH. It must be conceded that this is a most radical movement so far as the farmer is concerned. Without hearing from any commission, without taking any evidence as to the cost of production in other countries, without any notice whatever to the farmer, without any discussion in the campaign, without any suggestion anywhere, in the open or before the voters, there comes to us an agreement to put him not upon a tariff-for-revenue basis, where he might receive incidental protection, but on a free-trade basis, something that neither party has advocated within this country for the last 50 years.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Idaho piles alleged grievance on grievance one upon another about the sending in of this agreement here as if it came without warning and without notice. This reciprocity measure does not have so much to do with schedules, as it rests upon great fundamental facts. What is the great fundamental fact? That we have here a mere paper border line most of the way for 3,800 miles between people of the same blood, of the same aspirations, the same habits, the same average of consumption, and the same wages. To these conditions all schedules and prices are subordinate.

Mr. BORAH. That is equally true across the water. The Englishman in England does not speak any worse English than the Englishman in Canada. And it does not make any difference to the American farmer, when he finds another man in his market place, whether he speaks English or speaks Choctaw. The question is, Is he in possession of his market place, and does it materially injure him, not whether we are of the same blood or of the same race or the same language? We have never built a schedule or a tariff upon any such proposition. We have always been legislating against our mother country more than any one else on the tariff question.

Mr. BURTON. I must differ from the Senator from Idaho in regard to conditions across the water. They are radically different, not merely from what they are in the United States but from what they are in Canada. One is an old, settled country, an industrial country, distinctively commercial, with its enormous shipping, with its well-established industries, with its unsurpassed means of communication to all parts of the world. The most vital distinction of all between England and Canada is in wages, a distinction which is absolutely conclusive as regards reciprocal trade relations.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. If, as the Senator puts it, England is so mature that it is proper to legislate against England——

Mr. BURTON. I am not saying it is proper to legislate against her.

Mr. NELSON. Should it be our aim to help to place Canada as rapidly as possible in the condition of England, to put it on as big a footing as England is, to build that country up because its people are of the same blood? Is that the Senator's contention?

Mr. BURTON. I have no partiality for Canada or any country except my own. But I most radically demur to the idea that in building up Canada we are conferring a special benefit upon her. We are building up ourselves as well. We are recognizing the progress of the times, breaking over imaginary barriers, and promoting that good feeling and larger trade relations which should prevail between ourselves and our neighbor on the north.

I said some time ago that trade is not a game of cheat, where one gets the advantage of the other; certainly it is not if properly conducted. What benefits Canada must benefit ourselves.

Mr. REED. Why would that not be true——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield, and to whom?

Mr. BURTON. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri, because I know what question he is going to ask me.

Mr. REED. Why would that not be true, if trade is carried on because it is mutually beneficial, with England as well as with Canada?

Mr. BURTON. Because the conditions are as different from those in Canada as the morning sun is from the evening star.

Mr. REED. With the exception of wages, how are they different?

Mr. BURTON. In the more highly organized industries, in the means of communication all over the globe, in the enormous abundance of capital.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator claim that at this time American capital is not as potential and powerful as the capital of England?

Mr. BURTON. Not as abundant, nor are rates of interest so low here.

Mr. REED. Or that American machinery is not better and more skillfully managed than the machinery of England, and the products of the American mills produced cheaper than the products of the English mills, with the single exception of the difference in the cost of labor?

Mr. BURTON. That question can not be answered by yes or no. In some industries we have far greater assistance from machinery, from ingenuity and invention. In others we have not, because their machinery and equipment are superior to ours. It is not necessary to go beyond the difference in cost of labor; that is an entirely sufficient difference.

Mr. REED. I should like the Senator to be specific, to tell us in what line of industry, in what single great manufacturing enterprise, England has superior machinery and superior equipment to the American?

Mr. BURTON. Well, their machinery for cotton manufacture is certainly equal to ours, and for woolen as well.

Mr. BORAH. I think diplomacy is one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not think I could be very far wrong. Will the Senator bear with me a minute, just to get those figures right.

The crop which gave the farmer in 1890 his purchasing power was the crop of 1889, of course. I find that the price of corn——

Mr. BURTON. From what page are you quoting? I have the same book here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find that the price of corn for that year——

Mr. BURTON. May I ask what page you are reading from?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Page 125.

December 1 is the time at which it is taken, and, of course, the crop of 1889 is the crop which gave to the farmer whatever was his purchasing power in 1890, in so far as any crop did or could. In 1889 the price of corn was 28.3 cents. The farm value of the yield per acre was almost as low as it has ever been in the history of this country—perhaps as low—to wit, $7.63.

I find that the price of wheat that year was 69.8 cents, and that the money value of the yield per acre was only $8.98. And as a cotton planter, I will speak from memory and say that it was one of the years when raising cotton was almost below the cost of production.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Mississippi will concede, however, that it must be a good party policy—an excellent party to intrust with control—which in view of the low prices that he has named nevertheless gave prosperity to the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I had not intended——

Mr. BURTON. I want to say in that connection I have not examined those prices.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to go off into that, nor will I, because I do not want to interrupt the continuity of the address being made by the Senator from Ohio, who is always enlightening, even when he is partially wrong. But I deny, of course, that the Republican Party gave prosperity, and it is a fact that Cleveland went in principally for the reason that the Democrats at any rate persuaded the people—and the people were not fools I hope—that they were having hard times.

Mr. WARREN. Did they better it under President Cleveland?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, whether that was true or whether it was not, there is not a man within the sound of my voice who does not know that the chief slogan of the Democracy during that campaign was hard times and high prices under the Republican régime.

Mr. BURTON. Was there ever a presidential campaign when that was not charged by the Democratic Party?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think I heard it in the last campaign. I at least, as a Democratic speaker, said the country was in a high state of prosperity.

Will the Senator pardon me for telling a story? Has he time to let me tell a story, just a little story, that I have told before?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is said to have been told by Abraham Lincoln a long time ago. I do not know whether it was or not. There are a great many things laid on Abraham Lincoln. It is said that a woodpecker was on the rotten limb of a tree one day pecking and pecking and pecking, and after a while a wind came, and the wind blew down the tree, and the woodpecker died, believing he had pecked off the limb and destroyed the tree. I never think of that story without thinking of how the Republican Party, pecking and pecking at the pocketbooks of the people and living in a country with the most magnificent arena of free trade the world ever saw, 3,000 miles one way and nearly as large the other, have attributed to their injurious pecking the prosperity that came in spite of them and in the teeth of them, and that was not prevented by trammeling simply because the Constitution prevented you from trammeling it within the broad home area.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Mississippi is somewhat severe in his animadversions upon the Republican Party. I will perhaps at some other time examine these prices of corn.

What I wish to assert, and it is written in the industrial history of this country with a pen of iron, is that not only were there threats to our industry and to our prosperity with the election of Cleveland, but there was widespread ruin. You can not go before the people and win on a platform that the existing tariff is a robbery and a fraud, a spoliation of the many for the benefit of the few, thus threatening to upset our whole industrial fabric, without causing widespread disaster. And you did not have to wait until 1894, when your legislative machinery commenced its work upon the tariff. It began the very day after election, when people awoke to what it meant. Everyone who had in mind a project for enlarging old or beginning new industries began to stop and think. He concluded to keep his money in the bank rather than to risk it under such uncertain conditions.

Mr. BORAH. That is only true as to manufactures, not as to the production by the farmers, I presume.

Mr. BURTON. The farmer was also affected by the same situation, because his market was curtailed. You can not turn these hundreds of thousands of people out into the street without causing the farmer to suffer along with the rest.

As a retort courteous to the story of the Senator from Mississippi I will repeat an utterance—I am not sure I can remember it—of the late Senator Hoar, whom everybody respected. He said of that time—May, 1894: "The laborer has left the mill for the highway, the farmer and the merchant and the manufacturer are alike out of work. The statesmanship that lighted the furnaces has been succeeded by the statesmanship that builds soup houses. The fire of the furnace has gone out, and the fire of the incendiary has taken its place. The hum of the factory has given place to the humbug of the Democratic platform."

Mr. NELSON. Would it not be more appropriate to say that it has given rise to the humbug of reciprocity?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so. I part company with the Senator on that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask a serious question.

Mr. BURTON. I take it for granted that all the questions of the Senator from Idaho have been serious.

Mr. BORAH. What is the difference between closing down the manufacturing establishments, and thereby destroying the farmers' market place, and turning the manufacturer over to be supplied by another producer?

Mr. BURTON. I really do not get the application of that.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has just stated that owing to the fact that the manufacturing establishments were injured by the threats of tariff changes the farmer was not in a position to sell his products.

Now, the effect of this, either great or small, is to turn the manufacturing establishments over to another producer. What effect will that have upon the American farmer as distinguished from closing it down, so far as he is concerned?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator knows the present condition of trade between the United States and Canada. We send them $215,000,000 worth. They send us $95,000,000. We have well-equipped, highly organized industries. Some of them, it is true, are not yet under such organization as either the Senator from Idaho or I myself would regard as ideal. But nevertheless they do business; the products go out into foreign markets. Does he have any intimation or fear that any considerable share of our manufacturing is likely to be transferred to Canada?

Mr. BORAH. Well, that is not the point I was——

Mr. BURTON. Why not take the other phase of it? We have this enormous agricultural production, producing so very much more than Canada does. At present I do not know the actual balance in the aggregate of agricultural products imported into or exported from the United States, but I fancy there is not any glaring difference between them. Take into account that the increase in the demand for food products is marked every year; that the prices they pay to their wage earners are the same—it is true the price of land out in the northwest is somewhat less—but does the Senator anticipate that there is going to be any serious injury to the American farmer from the annexing of that market?

Mr. BORAH. Permit me to answer that question by asking one before answering. If it is not going to affect the price of the product of the farm, then how is it possibly going to lower the cost of living in this country?

Mr. BURTON. As far as concerns any substantial lowering of the cost of living this year or in the very near future, probably it will not. Whenever there is a year of scarcity in this country and abundance over in the other, there will be a certain amount of Canadian products that will come in. There are certain localities from which shipment will be made into the United States, where to-day there are tariff barriers preventing any transmission. It will exercise a certain steadying influence upon the market. Whenever you enlarge the area of trade you confer a great benefit upon all parties, provided the conditions among them are the same.

There is another thing it will do. The Senator from Idaho has heard of corners in the wheat market in Chicago. Ready communication between the two sides and shipments of products from one to the other will tend to defeat these and to diminish the profits of the middlemen and the exactions of those different brokers who are now getting so much of the profits which belong to the farmer.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming that the cornering of the products would be possible after this should happen, it would increase the gains of the man who could control it and corner it rather than decrease it—if he could control it.

Mr. BURTON. He would have to be a man of far greater capital than the usual speculator; he would have to take in a greater area, and overcome greater difficulties than confront him now.

Mr. BORAH. Our friends say to us in one breath that the importation from Canada will be so small that it will not affect American farmers and in the next breath it is so large that the cornerer can not corner it.

Mr. BURTON. If prices go up 10, 20, 30 cents, as they would in a corner, beyond a normal and natural price, I fancy Canadian products would come over in very considerable quantities.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest that the two propositions come pretty near making a corner for the author of the two propositions.

Mr. BURTON. I do not quite understand to what the Senator from Minnesota refers.

There is one question suggested by the interrogatories of the Senator from Idaho. I understand he has most cordially favored the development of the arid lands in the West. We have brought into cultivation very fertile areas; have increased the aggregate volume of numerous agricultural products. How does the possible increase of importations from Canada carry with it any greater danger than the increased production that comes from the development of those so-called arid lands?

Mr. BORAH. I have been interested in the arid lands of the West in the hope that those who were cultivating them would supply the large manufacturing centers of the East.

I do not know whether I can turn to it or not, but the premier of England stated the other day that if we would take the tariff wall down he would supply from the Canadian fields, where they neither irrigate nor cultivate their hay, sufficient hay to satisfy the large cities along the border. Now, that is our market.

Mr. BURTON. He may have exaggerated the possibility of that.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether the premier has exaggerated or not. He stated when he started out to make this agreement that he would make an agreement which would be beneficial to the Canadian farmer without injuring the Canadian manufacturer. I thought that was an exaggeration. I have since changed my mind.

So I am not prepared to say that he exaggerated, but I do know that the Idaho farmer has to pay a dollar and a half an acre for the water with which to irrigate his land, and I know that all this will keep him out of the market as against the Canadian farmer when, as the premier says, the Canadian neither irrigates nor cultivates the hay land along the border in Canada.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not true that the land for which the price of a dollar and a half an acre is paid for water each year is far and away more productive than any land not irrigated across the border?

Mr. BORAH. It is more productive, but if the Canadian producer can supply sufficient, the fact that the land is more productive only leaves more hay to rot. If we have not the market, that does not help us any.

Mr. BURTON. Is hay raised on that land?

Mr. BORAH. Very largely.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me that more valuable crops than that should be raised upon it.

Mr. BORAH. It is very easy to say to the farmer, "Change your crop," but there is a power above which sometimes interferes with that, and he can not change his crop without consulting the elements. He must raise that which he can raise, and it is the same as that which the Canadian raises.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me that this is one of the groundless fears expressed so many times in this discussion. Here on this splendid land, for which, it is true, that a dollar and a half an acre is paid for irrigation, does anyone think that hay or anything else is going to be driven out of profitable cultivation by land across the border? I have enough confidence in the Idaho farmer to believe that he will make his way and that his profits will compare favorably with those of any other farmer under the sun.

Some figures, which I intend to give in a few minutes, show that there has been more increase in the value of farm property in Idaho than in any other State. That looks as if the Idaho farmers were prosperous.

Mr. BORAH. That is quite true by reason of the fact that we have been living under different conditions from those under which we are to live in the future. Now, candidly, if Canadian farmers can supply our market, when we have only one, what are we going to do with our rich fields?

Mr. BURTON. Everything will continue as it is now. With an increase in population and an increase in consumption, there will be profitable markets for every acre that you cultivate. I do not think it makes very much difference whether it is hay or something else that is produced, this country is to use it and will furnish such an excellent market that any fertile acre in any State or Territory of the United States will be profitable for cultivation. There is no richer possession that any man can have than broad acres or even a single acre of fertile soil. The whole world demands the product of that acre, and somewhere there will be found, and probably right near at hand, a market at most satisfactory prices.

Mr. REED. I should like——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I should like to suggest that this might be an answer to the Senator from Idaho, that we who have to buy hay might get it for less than $20 a ton, and that would not carry any great curse with it.

But I wanted to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. It is taking him back some distance, but I tried to get the floor. I want to get one matter clear. The Senator from Idaho asked the Senator who has the floor if the alarm that he spoke of, which existed when the Democratic cloud was rising in the horizon, had affected farm production, and I understood the Senator from Ohio to say it had affected farm production.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think I said that it affected the amount of products, though probably it did. All that I was talking about was the general prosperity of the farmer. Then certain questions were asked as to the prices of corn, and so forth, which I am frank to say I have not carefully considered.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say that the alarm had decreased production.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think I said that.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Idaho said that would not apply to farm products, and I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that it did by taking away the market of the farmer. I simply wanted to have an understanding about it. Does the Senator claim that it did decrease the acreage or the production of the farm, or does he simply claim that it reduced the price of farm products?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Missouri, I think, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], is speaking of the yield, and I am speaking of the price. I am very sure I did not state that there was any diminished yield per acre.

Mr. REED. Is it not true that, while the price of farm products did go down in those years in the United States, they went down correspondingly in Canada, not only in the local market, but in every foreign market; that they went down in Liverpool, England, and went down the world around in those very years, just as they went down in this country?

Mr. BURTON. Suppose you concede for a minute that the difference was in shutting off the domestic market. It is not wheat that our farmers sell exclusively, nor oats, nor corn, nor potatoes. Farmers who are located near cities and towns obtain an especial benefit from the prosperity of inhabitants in the towns, but when those in the towns are not prosperous they, too, suffer.

Mr. REED. Did not the people eat as they had done before?

Mr. BURTON. Unfortunately, they did not.

Mr. REED. And did not horses and cattle eat the grain, as they had done before, and was there any great diminution either in the consumption or in the production of farm products?

Mr. BURTON. There was decidedly a very great decrease in the consumption.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio thinks that one of the benefits of this arrangement will be to prevent cornering of the market in the future. I assume that he had especial reference to cornering the wheat market, which has happened at various times in our history. Has the Senator examined the effect of a corner in the wheat market at any particular time upon the price of bread?

Mr. BURTON. I suppose the effect of a corner is to enable the farmer to sell his product at a higher price, temporarily, and that the price of bread is not materially raised during that time. In fact, the price of bread seems to ignore temporary fluctuations in the price of wheat.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not always true that a corner in the market affects the price of wheat in the hands of the farmer, but I agree that it might be true. But, of course, the corner is objectionable, if objectionable at all, from the standpoint we are now looking at this matter, because it would increase the cost of living, and if it does not increase the cost of living it is no harm at all except to the few who may be engaged in it. Therefore, if it does not affect the price of bread, why should we be so solicitous about getting the Canadian agricultural products in in order to prevent cornering?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Iowa stops only a brief distance short of eulogizing the man who corners the wheat market. In the long run any such disturbance in prices must affect the price of bread, because it increases the cost to the consumer.

Mr. President, I do not think we can look with complacency upon any such disturbances as is created by a corner in the cotton market or the wheat market or any other market. Somebody is going to pay eventually for the loss incurred. The farmer may pay for it at one time and somebody else at another. When speculators derive great profits in that way they usually get it at the cost of the people. It may not be the immediate consumer of bread, but some one somewhere must pay for what I was going to call a cataclysm in the market. There were railway wars years ago, in which freight was carried for almost nothing. Did the people benefit from them?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want the Senator from Ohio to assume that I eulogize corners in any sort of production. I am quite as much opposed to them in the grain market as in the stock market. But I have always understood the Senator from Ohio to be of the opinion that we could not regulate trusts and monopolies, and things of that sort, through a system of tariff. I suggest to him that by parity of reasoning we can not regulate a corner in the market by reason of our tariff. I think there are other things by which those harmful incidents can be regulated and prevented. But the real thing that is being held out now to the people is that by preventing corners in the wheat market we will reduce the cost of bread. The slightest knowledge of the history of the price of grain and the price of bread will lead to no other conclusion than that the two have nothing whatsoever to do with each other.

Mr. BURTON. Let me say, in answer to the Senator from Iowa, I do not see the similarity between a trust and monopoly as affected by tariff regulations and the organization of a movement to corner the wheat market.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is not that temporarily a monopoly?

Mr. BURTON. It is temporarily a monopoly. A trust or monopoly creates a settled course of business from year to year by a form of organization obnoxious to the law. The advantage in preventing a wheat corner would lie not merely in the absence of a tariff but in the far wider area available for the supply of grain.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to set the Senator from Iowa right before the Senator from Ohio proceeds. He overlooks the fact that it has been seriously argued that the farmers constitute a big trust in this country and that this reciprocity agreement is to break up that trust.

Mr. BURTON. I have not heard of that argument.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know the Senator from Ohio based his argument upon that hypothesis. If he is, everything I have said is irrelevant and immaterial.

Mr. BURTON. I have not heard of that argument, Mr. President. I think if they formed a trust it would be unwieldy and would fall of its own weight. I can see no disposition on their part to do anything of the kind. Nevertheless, I am sure that there are many in our population who, if they had a chance to form a profitable trust, would do so, although their opposition prior thereto had been so great that it seemed to be prompted by moral scruples and an upright conscience. But I do not expect the farmers to be counted among them.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is one other question I want to ask the Senator from Ohio, to get it clear in my own mind. I seem to agree with him as to one part of his answer and disagree with him as to another. Referring to certain years of adversity, which I will call the lean years, he indicated the farmer was a great sufferer because he lost a part of his demand, no matter how the loss was brought about. I do not want to get into any controversy with my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on that question. Here was a certain product to be marketed, and suddenly the demand became greatly less and therefore prices——

Mr. BURTON. I would not use the adverb "suddenly"; I would say "gradually."

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; it will serve my purpose just as well to use the word "gradually." The farmer suffered because his product, in comparison with the demand, was out of the ordinary and customary proportion. Now, in economics or in commerce what would have been the difference between the case I have just put and doubling the supply, leaving the demand precisely as it was? Would not that condition have had the same effect upon agricultural prices as to the diminution of the demand?

Mr. BURTON. In the first place, the Senator from Iowa presents a hypothesis that is altogether impossible. If the production that would look toward a certain market is doubled, what occurs? It does not seek its sale exclusively in one or even two countries. It is a factor in the supply of the whole world. Of course, it is true that there might be some perishable articles where the market would be near by and doubling the supply would mean either a great decrease in price or that they must rot, as is the case of strawberries when the market is glutted. But I do not regard that as at all applicable to this situation. Here is Canada, with but a comparatively small surplus of certain products to send over to us. As I have already shown by the figures, Canada sends twelve and one-fourth times as much of her agricultural products to England as she sends to the United States. Side by side with it the United States sends those same products to England. There is no possibility of doubling all the supply that is available to our market.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Ohio must realize that we have maintained against Canada practically a prohibitive tariff upon most agricultural products. Now, what has happened in the past under those tariffs can not be accepted as any guide to what will happen in the future when those tariffs are removed.

Mr. BURTON. But, if the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I stated two facts: First, that twelve and one-fourth times as much of Canadian products went to England, and that we in the United States were also exporters of those same products to England, sending the products along parallel lines.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will agree with the Senator from Ohio entirely if it be established that internal prices in the United States for the last few years have been export prices, but if they have not been export prices, then it seems to me the argument of the Senator from Ohio fails.

Mr. BURTON. Even if not export prices, nevertheless they are very much affected by the prices abroad.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] reminds me that in the purchase of the material for bread it is a comparatively small share of the population which buys baker's bread. Most of them buy flour and make their own bread or have it made in some form of cooperation, so the corner must affect the price to the consumer.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Ohio will examine the history of commerce in that respect he will find that flour does not follow the price of wheat with accuracy. It must continue over a long period of time, or a moderately long period of time, in order to find its result in the price of flour.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, there are three things that I have always regarded as not responding immediately in a change of prices. One is the prices of the retail dealer as compared with those of the wholesale dealer; another is the rate of wages as compared with the cost of living; another is the finished product as compared with the raw material; and I take it that applies in the case of flour. I think, however, if the price of wheat had gone up 50 cents or so a bushel in Chicago the flour dealer would be alert to increase his price somewhat.

Mr. CUMMINS. I venture the assertion that in a corner in which the price of wheat is raised 50 cents a bushel and it continues for only a month or two months, possibly, such a rise would find no result in the price of flour.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me hardly possible.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it would continue so that the general price of wheat was affected over a period of six months or a year, I agree that then you would find a corresponding increase in the price of flour.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I understood him to say a moment ago in answer to some inquiry or in a colloquy that Canada exported a great proportion of her wheat; that she sent abroad much more than she sent to the United States.

Mr. BURTON. I gave the figures merely of the general exportation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is not material to my inquiry. The Senator said at the same time we were sending along parallel lines, that we were exporting large quantities of wheat. That undoubtedly is true. But does the Senator know whether the wheat which we are exporting or have been recently exporting is of the same grade or character as the wheat which the Canadians have been exporting?

Mr. BURTON. The Canadians are exporting mostly spring wheat, I take it, because that is almost their exclusive product out in the northwest region. Is it not, I ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I presume there would also be a difference in this particular, that we export a very much larger proportion of flour.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the inquiry is pertinent and quite important if what we have heard in the speeches of various Senators from those States cuts any figure; that is, that we have not been exporting the sort of wheat which the Canadians raise and which would come into this market.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me that point assumes minor importance, and the great question is, What is the balance between the domestic wheat supply and the domestic demand? It does not matter whether it is winter wheat or spring wheat.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it is a decided factor in the situation, because, if it is a fact that we are not exporting the sort of wheat which the Canadians are raising, the Senator's argument, it seems to me, falls.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so. It is a question whether we are raising as much wheat as we consume, whether we have a surplus to send to a foreign country, and whether wheat will come across the line from Canada into the United States instead of going to England, and if it comes from Canada will it be ground into flour and exported?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is my position. The Senator took the position that it would not have any great effect, because we are also exporting large quantities of wheat. Now, my inquiry was whether the Senator is informed if we are exporting the sort of wheat that comes across the line?

Mr. BURTON. Now, let us see for just a minute how that proposition would work out.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a brief explanation in reference to the wheat matter?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. The wheat raised in Canada in the three western Provinces, where about all their surplus is grown, is what we call No. 1 hard spring wheat. It is a most superior quality of that kind of wheat. We export from this country from the Pacific Coast soft wheat flour, which is mainly shipped to the Orient. Then we export the softer varieties of winter wheat. That forms the chief amount of our export wheat. The wheat raised in the Northwestern States is hard spring wheat.

Mr. BURTON. That is in the Northwestern States of the Union?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; but it is not of a variety quite as hard. It ranks quite as high as the wheat raised in the three Provinces north of Minnesota and North Dakota.

Mr. BURTON. I am obliged to the Senator from Minnesota for his explanation. Now let us for a minute see how that problem would work out. Suppose a hundred million——

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator works that out, and in connection with it, will he explain what he means by our exporting along parallel lines?

Mr. BURTON. I mean that both Canada and the United States export to England.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would hardly be along parallel lines, I think.

Mr. BURTON. Grain leaves Canada by the St. Lawrence for Glasgow and Liverpool. Wheat and flour are exported from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore to the same ports.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator's argument, I think, fails to recognize the enormous territory that produces the spring wheat, and the hard spring wheat is not exported at all in any quantities. In fact, about half of the grain that is raised in the United States is of the spring variety. It takes in the great wheat-raising sections of Minnesota, a portion of Wisconsin, the two Dakotas, Montana, and Idaho, and that is the better grade of the spring wheat.

Mr. BURTON. It goes which way?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is consumed in the United States; it does not go out of the country at all. That grain is worth right along, and has been for three years, from 10 to 15 cents a bushel more than the Canadian grain, because the Canadian grain is sold upon an export basis. They were selling to Liverpool and they had to sell their grain for Liverpool prices less the cost of transportation and a reasonable profit, while ours ranged so high above the Liverpool prices that we could not export a single bushel of it, and our farmers got the benefit of that higher price. Now, what would be the result of this agreement, with the enormous amount of grain that can be raised right north of the Dakotas in the Canadian line, with 220,000,000 acres capable of producing 20 bushels to the acre, if all that was converted into wheat land? And remember that they can not raise beets and a thousand other little vegetables that are raised by farmers around generally. That country will be used almost exclusively for the raising of barley and wheat and flax in competition with our lands along the northern line.

The point I wanted to make clear to the Senator is that you do injure all the farmers in those States. It is a most important industry, and they will be affected by it, although we might still export grain from New Orleans or San Francisco.

Mr. BURTON. That is, your grain goes out into the States of the Union and is consumed there.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is consumed there, and is not affected by the Liverpool prices.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator states that the grain across the border is 10 or 15 cents a bushel lower because it is based upon Liverpool price.

Mr. McCUMBER. Because it has to go to Liverpool.

Mr. BURTON. What is sure to happen in that case? If the grain on the other side is as good as yours, the demand for it in the States of the Union will cause it to rise over night to the same price as your wheat in North Dakota. It can not have any other result. Possibly there may be some slight approximation in price between them, as I have already pointed out.

Mr. McCUMBER. They have enough to supply the market and make a surplus of what we would need in the United States and still it would not affect the price of what they would have to export.

Mr. BURTON. That, I think, is an exaggeration.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator believe if they raise 250,000,000 bushels of No. 1 hard necessarily most of it will have to be exported?

Mr. BURTON. If there is any such increased production of wheat there it will be gradual; it will be adjusted to the markets of the whole world, not to those of North Dakota or of other border States. The Canadians will not grow it unless there is a demand for it.

There is one question I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota: You have flouring mills that grind wheat in your State?

Mr. McCUMBER. Very little; most of it is sent to Duluth.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, you send your wheat away to Minneapolis and Duluth?

Mr. McCUMBER. To Duluth, and it comes back.

Mr. BURTON. That is another factor in the situation. The price of flour there is very considerably affected by the shipment out of that locality to a milling locality and then bringing it back.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator spoke about the gradual increase in production in the Northwest. Has the Senator investigated to ascertain what has been the gradual change in Saskatchewan and in Alberta in the last 10 years?

Mr. BURTON. I have the figures, showing the increase year by year, and they show about 4 per cent a year on the average.

Mr. McCUMBER. Where?

Mr. BURTON. In Canada as a whole.

Mr. McCUMBER. In Saskatchewan alone the increase in 10 years, or from 1898 to 1909, was from about 4,500,000 bushels to more than 90,000,000 bushels.

Mr. BURTON. The fallacy of the argument of the Senator from North Dakota is in picking out a limited area upon the earth's surface and pointing to enlarged production, and at the same time ignoring the hundreds of millions of mouths that must be fed the world over. Any particular increase in any one locality, phenomenal though it may be, is absorbed by the markets of the whole world. No other condition would justify increased production anywhere. It is not different from the manufacture of a new article. It does not differ in any degree from any increase of production. When production reaches the point where it is unprofitable, it slackens all along the line.

Now, what will happen to the wheat of Canada? It will come down and probably be mingled with the wheat in North Dakota and go to those States in the East and Central West that have been consuming it in the past.

Mr. McCUMBER. And will not that place us upon an export basis; in other words, make our wheat no more valuable than the Canadian wheat, or practically the same?

Mr. BURTON. Unless it is a better quality of wheat—and I take it it is not—it will rise to the same price.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; certainly; and that will be the export price.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; not the export price, but as the Senator admits, influenced by the export price. The price the world over is a very decided factor in what you receive for your wheat now—not a conclusive one, but the most important one.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is a factor in the general value.

FARMERS NOW RECEIVE RELATIVELY HIGH PRICES.

Mr. BURTON. The change in conditions has been very manifest in the comparative prices of agricultural and other products. A table issued by the Statistical Bureau of the Agricultural Department last winter shows this very clearly. This bulletin shows that the average rate of increase from 1899 to 1909 in the price of commodities purchased by the farmer was 12.1 per cent, while the average rate of increase in the value per acre of articles which he sells was 72.7 per cent, or six times as much.

Following is the table:

Purchasing power of an acre of farm crops in 1909 as compared with 1899, etc.—Continued.

Now, no one wishes in any way to disparage the farmer. After long years of rather unprofitable farming he has come into his own and is getting very much higher prices than he used to receive. He is not going to be injured by a little reciprocity with Canada, because the demand for food products the world over is ever increasing. He is going to continue to hold his own. I repeat, causes that are world-wide have created this situation.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in some remarks made at a prior session, very accurately and skillfully set forth the difference in the equivalent values of farm products and other articles as shown by comparison with 10 years ago.

The following figures give a comparison of prices per unit and farm value per acre of products of the farm, with a list showing the comparative prices of articles purchased by farmers both in 1909 and 1899. In the list of articles purchased is included sugar, flour, and lard, directly or indirectly the products of the farm, but for the increase in the price of the last two articles the disproportion in favor of the farmer would be greater:

[2] Includes figures for Oklahoma and Indian Territory.
A minus sign (—) denotes decrease.

Some figures recently prepared by the Census Bureau regarding the values of farm property in the United States are especially emphatic in their proof of the prosperity of the farming population. It is to be regretted that in a dozen States the number of farms has not increased and in others that the acreage, as well as the quantity of improved land, is less than 10 years ago. But with the single exception of the District of Columbia, where the manifest reason is the occupation of considerable areas for residence, the values of farm lands have shown a most remarkable increase between 1900 and 1910; an increase rarely equaled in any previous decade in any species of property, real or personal. This increase has occurred not only in States of exceptional growth where there is an increase in the number of farms and their total acreage, like Florida, with an increase in farm values of 203 per cent; Oregon, 262 per cent; North Dakota, 321 per cent; South Dakota, 376 per cent; Washington, 419 per cent; Idaho, last of all, where they are afraid, it seems, that their crop of hay will not bring so good a price, 518 per cent, but everywhere there appears a uniform increase. What does this show except a prosperous condition?

Alike in the uniformity of increase, though with less percentage, are the increases in the value of farm buildings and of implements and machinery. Only one State shows a decrease in either of these particulars, while a considerable number show that the value has more than trebled.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator recite those figures for the purpose of showing that the farmers have been too prosperous and that they ought to be knocked out by reciprocity?

Mr. BURTON. "Knocked out by reciprocity"—let us adopt that phrase. Why, Mr. President, I confidently predict that the Senator from Minnesota in the course of a year will forget even his own arguments against this bill. It can not create any such disaster as is being talked about. You are not going to destroy the farmers' prosperity by anything of this kind.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask if I understand the Senator correctly. Does he maintain that allowing Canadian wheat to come into this country free will have no effect upon the price of wheat in the United States? Is that his position?

Mr. BURTON. It will probably have a slight effect. The proper calculation to make would be based on the comparative production in the two countries of 5 to 1, and the natural reduction in the price in the United States would be one-sixth of the difference in price between the two countries. I do not deny that in certain localities the effect will be more than that.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. How does the Senator account for the fact that the bonded warehouses on this side of the boundary line pay, on an average, 13 cents a bushel less for Canadian wheat in bond than the American elevators in the same towns are paying for American wheat of the same grade?

Mr. BURTON. I should doubt very much whether that was a permanent condition; but, if so, it simply shows that, along the line explained by the colleague of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], their wheat goes into the Eastern States or the Central Western States for milling purposes.

Mr. MCCUMBER. One is for export and the other is consumed at home. That is the whole explanation.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish to take up the Senator's time, but to-morrow, when I intend to make a few remarks on the pending measure, I shall insert not only tables but certificates, and I shall prove to the Senator from Ohio that it is a fact that the American farmer is getting from 10 to 15 cents more for his wheat than is the Canadian farmer.

Mr. BURTON. Is that condition permanent?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; permanent.

Mr. BURTON. The colleague of the Senator from North Dakota, I repeat, stated that the reason was that the wheat across the border was available for export, and brought the price of Liverpool minus the freight to Liverpool, warehousing and charges of that kind, while that on the south side of the line was sent into the——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Minneapolis mills.

Mr. BURTON. Does it go to the Minneapolis mills?

Mr. MCCUMBER. It is consumed at home.

Mr. BURTON. I must say, Mr. President, that while I am a protectionist, and a strong one, it seems to me that it is a very unnatural situation that wheat in one warehouse right within a few miles of wheat in another warehouse, the grain being alike valuable for bread, should differ in price 13 or 15 cents on one side because of any such artificial or arbitrary arrangement as that. It is confined to one locality, evidently. There is no such general difference throughout the United States. I must say also that I do not yet see how, when so considerable a quantity of wheat is exported from the United States, the price of surplus wheat of North Dakota can fail to be governed by the export price.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to correct the Senator. The warehouses are both in the same city or town in the United States.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; but Canadian wheat, of course, is in bond. It must be carried through in bond.

Mr. GRONNA. I almost feel that I am imposing on the good nature of the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. BURTON. Not by any means. I am glad to hear from my friend from North Dakota at any time.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask the Senator another question. Is it not true that Canada to-day ships into this country, or imports into this country, about ten times as much dairy products as we export to Canada?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, if the Senator will allow me to make the statement, the statistical——

Mr. BURTON. In many things we ship more in there than they ship in here.

Mr. GRONNA. Of butter, cheese, and eggs Canada last year exported to this country more than $800,000 worth.

Mr. BURTON. Of what?

Mr. GRONNA. Of butter, cheese, eggs, milk, and cream.

Mr. BURTON. That is not an enormous quantity. I know a single county that produces more than that.

Mr. GRONNA. We exported to Canada some $80,000 worth—less than $90,000.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator has the figures on that subject, I should be very glad if he would present them to the Senate. In a little time I could find some showing that the total amount of eggs that they ship to the whole world is less than $100,000 worth, proving that they are consumed at home. They have a home market, just as we do. It is a growing country, with a constantly increasing demand for farm products from industrial and professional classes. A stranger thing might happen than that the time would come in 50 or 75 years when they would be importing certain agricultural products on a large scale.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I only wish to say that I do not care to insert any tables of mine now or to take the time of the Senator from Ohio while he is making a speech; but I shall to-morrow submit a table in relation to this matter.

Mr. BURTON. Very good. I have the Canadian Yearbook right here by me and if there were time I could refer to it. Let us look at the increase in the values of farm lands in a few other States in addition to those very large amounts that I have given. Arkansas's increase is 133 per cent; California's, 109 per cent; Colorado's, which I did not mention, 100 per cent; and even Pennsylvania, with its great industrial growth and abandonment of lands for mining and industrial purposes, shows an increase of 9 per cent. Ohio shows an increase of 57 per cent and New York of 28 per cent in the value of lands.

I should certainly hesitate a very long time to advocate any policy which would in the slightest degree inure to the disadvantage of the farmer, whatever my opinion might be of the best tariff policy to be adopted. The simple fact is, however, a tiller of the soil supplies articles the prices of which have increased altogether out of proportion to the average of other commodities. It is probable that by reason of the complicated machinery of distribution and the increase in the profits of the middleman he has not realized the benefits which he should. This subject requires the careful attention of Congress and such legislation as may give the farmer the full benefit of increased prices for farm produce. The remedy lies not in tariff legislation but in other directions.

ATTRACTIONS OF FARM LIFE.

Much has been said in this discussion of the hardships and arduous labors of the farmer. From an experience of some years on the farm I can express my acquiescence in much of what has been said. The farmer labors early and late, in all kinds of weather, in the midst of numerous discouragements from drought, from insects, from a multitude of causes which endanger his crops and make his returns unequal and uncertain from year to year. But, after all, his happiness and prosperity are more thoroughly assured than that of any other element of our population. It is true there is not before him any dazzling prospect of social prominence or political preferment. He has no quickening prospect to be numbered among the millionaires and great capitalists of the country. His life is apart from the busy centers of population, with their whirl of amusements and opportunities for recreation. But, withal, his life is in that most wholesome of all theaters, the open air, in full sight of the heavens and with a clear sky overhead. The trees and brooks which many travel miles to see are daily before his eyes. The enervating influences of bad air and of cramped quarters are not his lot. However much the cities may thrive he may have the consciousness that the cities must depend upon him. If he has not the same opportunity for the pleasure and dissipation of this modern day, he has a less exciting and a happier domestic life, and confidently expects that, while his horizon may be limited, his children may be the heirs to the richest prizes of fortune. For true it is that in all great branches of industry, in the State, finance, and in the professions, the sons of farmers have enjoyed and will enjoy a proud preeminence. In the whole range of human employment there is no one who has less occasion for envy. In the acquisition of qualities which give strength and long life the farmer is easily in the lead. Compare with his position that of the miner who goes to the pit's mouth and descends into the bowels of the earth not entirely certain that he will ever see the light again; the machinist or workman in the factory, who must always labor within quarters more or less cramped and in an unwholesome atmosphere, and in the winter months can not see his family during all the hours of daylight. Indeed, compare with the farmer the busy man of affairs, racked by anxiety, sometimes not knowing whether the morrow may bring success or ruin! No wonder the sons and daughters of the farmer attain so prominent a place in our American life. They are free from the distractions and excitement, the unwholesome surroundings and influence which often make life a travesty on what it should be.

Mr. President, I do not believe in any undue laudation or disparagement of any of our population. It is our duty to legislate as best we may for all the occupations which go to make up our complex civilization, and in such legislation there is nothing which should appeal to us more than to give to all an abundance of the necessaries of life. I can hardly accept without demur the pessimistic forecast of those who think that our agricultural production will fall below our consumption in so short a time. As pointed out by the Senator from Idaho a few days ago, a very large share (he said one-half, I believe) of the lands of private ownership are yet to be cultivated. Regions which were regarded as desert wastes, by irrigation have come to be numbered among the most productive lands in the world, and in this connection I may say why should those who oppose reciprocity with Canada because it will increase the supply of needful articles, favor the development of lands by irrigation? If increase in one direction is harmful, increase in the other is also harmful.

PREVIOUS RECIPROCITY AGREEMENTS.

I wish now, Mr. President, to take up a question to which I should like to give longer time, though I think I can dispose of it in a few minutes; that is, previous reciprocity agreements. I take it it is the desire to adjourn at about 5 o'clock, is it not?

Mr. PENROSE. At 5 o'clock, or 6, perhaps, if the Senator would prefer 6.

Mr. BURTON. I think I can finish my remarks to-night.

Frequent references have been made in the Senate and in popular discussion to the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada, or Great Britain for Canada, which was in force from 1855 to 1866. It has been alleged that this agreement resulted in great disadvantages to the United States, and attention has been called to the abrogation of the treaty by a decisive vote of both the Senate and the House in the latter part of 1864. It is confidently asserted that the proposed agreement now pending is similar to the prior one, and that, like the former, it will result in disadvantage. True, that was in many respects similar to the one now under consideration, though it gave free access to the wool of Canada and retained duties on hay and hops. But the most superficial examination of circumstances relating to this former pact, in the light of circumstances existing at the time of the Civil War, shows the reason for its revocation. In the first place, let it be noted—I want to call special attention to this—that there was absolutely no protest against it from the farmers of the United States; no remonstrance was filed with Congress, either by them or in fact by anyone. The preponderant sentiment, as manifested in the country, was for radical changes in the terms of the agreement, but not for revocation.

There was some slight reference to the fact that the wool of Vermont might be injured; but the facts stated in this regard were easily refuted and no one stood sponsor for them. Senator Chandler, of Michigan, said that in 1855 he had opposed the treaty and that he opposed it then; that it did no good to the miner or to the agriculturist; but he made no specifications. There is no evidence in all the discussion that the prices of farm produce were diminished one iota anywhere in the United States.

The agricultural interests west of the Alleghenies opposed the abrogation of the treaty for two reasons. One was that they had facilities in their region for the transportation of their products down the St. Lawrence River, and as navigation on this route was secured by the reciprocity treaty they feared they would lose that opportunity in case of its revocation. The sequel was that they were still allowed the privilege and that the treaty of Washington in 1871 established the permanent rights of the United States to use it. Another reason was the fear that internal-revenue duties would be imposed upon some of their products. At that time internal-revenue duties were imposed on almost everything.

There was substantial opposition from the transportation interests of the country, who desired a monopoly in carrying the grain and products of the interior to the Atlantic seaboard. The most important objection to it arose from the imposition of heavy internal-revenue taxes on numerous categories of products in the United States, which were thereby placed at a disadvantage in competition with the Canadian producer, who could send his articles into the United States without payment either of internal-revenue taxes or duties.

In this connection, Mr. President, it may be said that the internal-revenue system established at that time was a most remarkable one. Taken all in all, we shall probably not look upon its like again in any plan of taxation. It was especially characterized by the multiplicity of the objects taxed. In speaking of the effect of our system of internal taxation, an Austrian writer has said:

> The citizen of the Union paid a tax every hour of the day, either directly or indirectly, for each act of his life, for his movable and immovable property, for his income as well as his expenditure, for his business as well as his pleasure.

Repairs on buildings were taxed. The householder could not improve his dwelling without paying a fine for doing so. Every successive process of manufacture was taxed, as well as almost every operation of business or commerce.

It is interesting to review this system, Mr. President, and it has some bearing on the discussion of this question, that two opposing theories as to internal-revenue taxation were advanced at this time. One was by Senator Sherman, of Ohio, to the effect that the number of objects of taxation should be limited, while the other was advanced by Senator Morrill, of Vermont, that the largest possible number of articles should be subject to internal taxation, with the thought of making the whole country and all classes bear the burden equally. The latter theory was adopted, though it must be said that the most expert opinion in regard to internal-revenue taxation now favors limiting the number to a few well-ascertained objects. This was a sufficient reason for the abrogation of that treaty. It is plainly evident that in the face of such a disadvantage as this it was not fair to the American producer to allow the free importation of Canadian produce.

There was another reason, almost as important, for the abrogation of this treaty. In those days there was no united Canada and each of the Provinces had its separate system of import duties. Up to about the year 1863 there was a substantial balance in our favor in the trade with Canada. Then divers higher protective duties came to be enforced in the several Provinces, the rates being increased in some instances 100 per cent and in others 60 per cent. This placed our trade at a very great disadvantage. On the other hand, very few dutiable articles were sent across the line to the United States. The statement was made, and not contradicted, that the duties collected on the Canadian border were not sufficient to pay the cost of collection. Here, Mr. President, were ample reasons for the revocation of this treaty.

In addition there were others which may be termed sentimental in their nature. Canada was a resort for those who wished to avoid the draft, and a starting point for forays across our border. This caused strained relations between the Northern States and Canada.

The Alabama incident also strained our relations with England. It is important to recognize that in all the discussion which preceded the abrogation numerous memorials were received from various portions of the country, as well as resolutions of State legislatures, asking that the existing treaty be modified and continued. The Legislature of the State of New York passed a lengthy resolution to that intent.

No one can correctly state that the reason for the abrogation of that treaty was due to a feeling of the agricultural producer that he was subjected to any discrimination; nor was it due to anything else essential or permanent in its nature.

Since then there have been varying trade conditions between the United States and Canada. In some years the imports into the United States have been greater, but more frequently the exports have exceeded the imports. Of late, however, the balance has been overwhelmingly in our favor. Canada has become by all odds our best per capita customer. The reason for this it is not difficult to see. The habits, customs, language, and necessities of her people are very much the same as ours. Between the United States and Canada there are the very readiest means of communication. Many things are common to both countries. The navigator on the Great Lakes and connecting waters passes without a moment's hesitancy from the waters of the United States to those of Canada, and vice versa.

What is the present condition of our trade with Canada? Our imports in 1910 were $95,000,000, $52,000,000 of which were dutiable, and exports were $215,000,000, a balance in our favor of over $120,000,000. Let us note these surprising statistics. Our exports to Canada were nearly $50,000,000 more than to all of South America, Asia, and Africa combined, nearly twice as much as to France, and only $30,000,000 less than to Germany. For 19 years the balance of trade with Canada has been in our favor each year, increasing from $8,000,000 in 1892 to the maximum figure of $120,000,000 in 1910. Under these circumstances it is but fair that we should be liberal in any bargain made with our northern neighbor.

That does not mean any partiality to Canada, but it does mean that a country that gives us a balance of trade of $120,000,000 in a year is entitled to fair consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before passing to the new subject I desire to ask, and I do it for information, or, rather, to confirm my recollection, whether it is not true that the treaty of 1854 was amended in the Senate?

Mr. BURTON. I really am not informed on that point. It was a treaty submitted to the Senate. Afterwards both Houses approved it. My attention has never been called to that question before.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know it was a treaty negotiated or made under the treaty-making power, but my recollection is that the Senate changed it very materially before it ratified it. I am not sure about that, and I thought possibly the Senator from Ohio might know.

Mr. BURTON. I am not sure. I have examined papers relating to that treaty which, it seems to me, would have contained a reference to changes if any had been made, and yet I am unable to state positively.

RECIPROCITY IN COMPETITIVE PRODUCTS IS A REPUBLICAN DOCTRINE.

Much has been said of the principle of reciprocity, and it has been confidently asserted here that reciprocity in competitive products is not a Republican doctrine—indeed, others on the Democratic side have gone so far as to say that it is not a Democratic doctrine—leaving this method of enlarging trade as a rejected principle, approved or fathered by no political organization. I am willing to concede that many prominent men in the Republican Party have expressed their opposition to reciprocity. But just as prominent Republicans have been in favor of such a policy, and whatever some of them may have said on the hustings, in their official acts they favored reciprocity in competitive products.

Let us cite a few facts, beginning with the close of the Civil War. Mr. James A. Garfield, elected as a Republican to the Presidency of the United States in 1880, in 1865 voted against the revocation of the treaty with Canada, and with him voted such a stalwart protectionist as Mr. Samuel J. Randall. President Grant and his Secretary, Hamilton Fish, advised the renewal of this treaty in 1874. And I want to refer to that a little later. In the year 1875 a treaty was concluded with the Hawaiian Islands which provided for the free admission of vegetables, undressed hides and skins, unrefined sugar, and other articles then subject to duty.

To-day more sugar is brought into this country from Hawaii than all of the beet sugar raised in the country, and more than all of the cane sugar. It is true there is a duty on sugar, which changes the situation somewhat, and primarily I am making these quotations only to show what the Republican doctrine of reciprocity has been. Although Mr. Blaine voted in favor of the abrogation of the Canadian treaty in 1865, in 1890 he sent to Senator Hale, during the pendency of the McKinley bill in the Senate, an interesting amendment, as follows:

> And the President of the United States is hereby authorized, without further legislation, to declare the ports of the United States free and open to all products of any nation of the American hemisphere upon which no export duties are imposed, whenever and so long as such nation shall admit to its ports, free of all national, provincial (State), municipal, and other taxes, flour, corn meal, and other breadstuffs; preserved meats, fish, vegetables, and fruits; cottonseed oil, rice, and other provisions, including all articles of food; lumber, furniture, and other articles of wood; agricultural implements and machinery, mining and mechanical machinery; and structural iron, steel rails, locomotives, railway cars and supplies, street cars, refined petroleum, or such other products of the United States as may be agreed upon.

Here was provision for the very broadest reciprocity with all America, including Canada, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator understand that if such a proposition was to-day made to Canada she would accept it?

Mr. BURTON. I am not sure that she would. There was a time when probably she would have accepted it.

Mr. SMOOT. My information is otherwise, that Canada to-day, if such a proposition as that was offered her, would reject it.

Mr. BURTON. In the last 14 or 15 years a great manufacturing interest has grown up in Canada. There is a manufacturers' association there which is one of the strongest business or commercial associations, I think I may say without exaggeration, in the world, and they have the same idea of fostering home industry and manufactures which has prevailed in this country.

Referring again to the amendment proposed by Mr. Blaine, persons who interviewed Mr. McKinley at that time state that this amendment met his approval and that he advocated and voted for it in the committee.

What I want to call attention to is that this was sweeping and included countries where conditions were widely different.

I remember a discussion years ago in the House in which a woolgrower of Iowa—Iowa was then a large wool-producing State—said that they could raise wool in Brazil as cheap as they could raise hay. Nevertheless this resolution drawn by Mr. Blaine proposed to throw down all barriers in the Northern and Southern Hemispheres.

Later during McKinley's administration he authorized and instructed Mr. Kasson to negotiate certain trade agreements with foreign countries. These trade agreements, rejected by the Senate, included certain competitive articles. In the year 1899 he transmitted a convention with Barbados providing for a reduction of 12½ per cent from the rates of duty on cane sugar and molasses, fresh fruits, and fresh vegetables imported into the United States; in the same year a convention with British Guiana providing for a reduction of 12½ per cent on practically the same articles; also conventions with Jamaica and Bermuda providing for a reduction of 12½ per cent on cane sugar and molasses, and 20 per cent on fresh vegetables, oranges, lemons, and potatoes from Jamaica and upon other articles from Bermuda, omitting sugar; a more important convention with Argentina in 1899, by which it was proposed to admit sugar, hides, and wool at a reduction of 20 per cent; also, in the same year, one with Ecuador, which admitted cane sugar and hides and skins of neat cattle at a reduction of 20 per cent. A convention was also concluded with Nicaragua, admitting sugar, hides, and skins at 20 per cent reduction; and, in 1900, with Denmark, governing trade with the island of St. Croix, by which sugar was to be admitted at a reduction of 12½ per cent. A very elaborate and important agreement was made under the direction of President McKinley with France, which included a very large schedule of articles, on which reductions varying from 5 to 20 per cent were to be granted.

This was an important one because it is a nation on the same footing as ourselves. It included silk and cotton goods, and also various chemicals, preserved fruits, medicinal preparations and perfumery, earthen and glass ware, cutlery, paper, all of them competitive articles.

It seems to me this enumerated list is sufficient to show that President McKinley favored not only the principle but the practice of reciprocity, and reciprocity in competitive articles.

In significant words, he said in his second inaugural:

> Our diversified productions, however, are increasing in such unprecedented volume as to admonish us of the necessity of still further enlarging our foreign markets by broader commercial relations. For this purpose reciprocal trade arrangements should in liberal spirit be carefully cultivated and promoted.

One of the most important achievements of Mr. McKinley's administration was the adjustment of our relations with Cuba, under which we were to admit at a reduction of 20 per cent sugar imported from that island. That arrangement was not ratified during the life of President McKinley, but was earnestly advocated by President Roosevelt, and was adopted during his administration in the month of November, 1903.

The project for the treaty of reciprocity with Canada submitted by President Grant in 1874 proposed three schedules for eventual free admission into both countries. Schedule A consisted of the same list of articles included in the treaty of 1854. Schedule B contained a list of 39 agricultural implements. Schedule C enumerated a long list of manufactures, including boots and shoes and machinery for making the same; cotton denims, drillings, and tickings; carts and wagons; iron nails, bolts, and castings; steel rails and plates; print paper and machines for making the same; and tweeds of wool. This is a very broad, comprehensive list, amounting, practically, to free trade between the contracting countries.

The agreement contemplated that each of the above schedules were to be reduced by a sliding scale. From July 1, 1875, to June 30, 1876, two-thirds of the regular duties were to be imposed; for the year ending June 30, 1877, one-third the regular duties; while after July 1, 1877, and for a period of 21 years, all articles enumerated in the three schedules were to be admitted duty free into each country when coming from the other.

I now come to certain reciprocity treaties negotiated in the administration of President Arthur, who also gave his approval to the principle of reciprocity. In 1883 he submitted a treaty with Mexico, providing for the free admission into this country of eggs—the Senator from North Dakota was fearful of the admission of eggs—beef, hides, unrefined sugar, and vegetables. In the following year he also negotiated similar treaties with the Dominican Republic, and with Spain for Cuba and Porto Rico.

The treaty with Mexico was ratified by the Senate and proclaimed by the President, but failed because Congress neglected to enact stipulated confirmatory legislation. It is an interesting fact regarding the treaties with the Dominican Republic and with Spain that they were both withdrawn from the Senate the following year by President Cleveland.

It is also interesting to note that as early as 1859 President Buchanan submitted a very comprehensive reciprocity agreement with Mexico, proposing to admit into each country when coming from the other, at reduced rates or free as the Congress of the United States might determine—it gave an option—a wide range of articles, including practically all farm products, all cotton fabrics except brown sheeting, and farming and mining implements.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES ALWAYS AROUSE OPPOSITION.

In this connection I want to say that no reciprocal arrangement has ever been entered into by any nation that has not aroused violent opposition, which opposition, I think I am safe in saying, has been proven by experience to be groundless. This was true when the various countries of Germany formed a zollverein, or customs union, in the early thirties.

This included the States of north Germany, nearly all of them, and a few of the States of south Germany. It afterwards became practically universal. For part of the time there was a reciprocity agreement with Austria on one side and those forming the zollverein on the other. Though those who joined in this agreement were of the same language, there were diversities in religion, in the form of government, and in trade conditions; the conflicting interests of the agricultural and manufacturing population and of those engaged in different forms of manufacture—as, for example, makers of yarn and makers of cloth—were plainly in evidence. In addition to all these, there were traditional grounds of repulsion.

There was one other important objection to the agreement. The customs collected at the different customhouses of all these various States were divided pro rata according to population. Apparently there was a grievous injustice in that, such countries as Prussia received a much smaller portion of the aggregate amount than they would have received from the duties collected at their customhouses. Nevertheless this agreement was so helpful to the German States as a whole, and in fact to each of them, that it continued down to the formation of the German Empire in 1870–71. When, for political as much as for economic reasons, Napoleon III in 1860 entered into a treaty with England which involved very considerable reduction in duties collected there was the same opposition, but both countries were aided by the readjustment of trade relations between them.

The free admission of sugar from Porto Rico, as well as the importation of a limited amount from the Philippines, awakened violent opposition. The same is true of the reciprocity agreement with Cuba in 1903; it can be vividly remembered by some in this Chamber. But both countries have gained by the arrangement.

OBJECTIONS TO AMENDING THE PACT.

Numerous suggestions have been made with reference to amending this proposition and some degree of censure has been visited upon the administration for sending in this agreement at all. But, Mr. President, under the Constitution it is the clear right of the President to make communications and recommendations to the Congress. It is his right also to express in public addresses in whatever terms he may choose his advocacy of any line of policy. Not only President Taft but his predecessor and other Presidents have made free to advocate national policies recommended by them in messages with no uncertain voice. Otherwise the President is neither the leader of his party nor does he occupy that place in the public attention which the public demands of him.

Of course, it is for the Senate and the House to accept or reject or amend any proposition that he may send here. I think, however, we overlook numerous instances in which bills in completed form have been sent in by the President or members of his Cabinet. Secretary Chase, in a special session called July 4, 1861, sent in a complete tariff bill which was accepted almost verbatim by the Congress, an act which I think was passed in the Congress about the 18th of July, and went into effect August 5, 1861.

Let us concede for the minute that the agreement is not a completed pact until it is favorably acted upon by the Congress of the United States and the Canadian Parliament; what is the best thing for us to do? This is a great international question, an international agreement framed after long consultation between the commissioners of Canada and the commissioners of the United States, and approved by the respective executive departments of the two separate countries. No tariff bill pleases everybody. This agreement probably did not altogether satisfy President Taft and his administration nor did it entirely please the Canadians. But it is here before us and, Mr. President, I strongly urge that it be adopted in its entirety as it appears here to-day, without any effort at amendment.

It is different from other legislation. It is different from those laws which are passed where the Senate and the House can agree by conference committees. Consultation must necessarily be at long range, and every modification that is proposed renders more threatening a situation already delicate and I may say intricate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to ask a question of the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Aside from the treaty with Hawaii, did we ever make a treaty, a reciprocal arrangement, that admitted the products of any other country into this country free? The French treaties of course were merely adjustments of tariffs.

Mr. BURTON. Of course, with Cuba——

Mr. HEYBURN. Cuba, of course, was under peculiar circumstances. I am speaking now of the independent stronger nations of the earth. Did we ever do more than to agree upon rates of duty?

A reciprocity treaty might be based upon very high rates of duty as well as upon low. But I merely inquire whether or not the Senator in his investigation has found any treaties which we made, termed a treaty of reciprocity, in which there was more than an adjustment of duties, and the duties we imposed were considered equivalent to the difference in the cost of production between the two countries?

Mr. BURTON. I think there has been more or less of concession in each case. That is, I do not think there has been any exact balance arrived at between the two sides.

Mr. HEYBURN. The treaty with France maintained duties which were protective in their character.

Mr. BURTON. In the proposed treaty with France each country was to reduce certain duties on imports from the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is not the Senator from Ohio mistaken in assuming that our treaty or arrangement with Cuba admitted anything free?

Mr. BURTON. It did not admit anything free. It provided for a 20 per cent reduction on sugar and the preferential admission of certain of our products.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was simply a reduction in our duties.

Mr. BURTON. The principle is the same.

Mr. HEYBURN. You could hardly consider any arrangement with Cuba the same as an arrangement with other countries, because the conditions are peculiar.

Mr. BURTON. What I have read from these different reciprocity treaties may assume in the minds of Senators greater importance than was intended. What I selected them for was to refute the idea that reciprocity in competitive products was an idea that had not been favored by Republican leaders. It clearly has been advocated by McKinley and by Blaine and by Grant and by numerous others.

Mr. CUMMINS. Lest I should be misunderstood about that, I want to say I agree entirely with the Senator from Ohio upon that proposition. I believe that reciprocity does embrace arrangements with regard to competitive commodities.

Mr. BURTON. Indeed, it would be practically impossible to make any treaty of any considerable scope that did not embrace them. You might say we will let coffee in from Brazil, but even that would be a competitive product with our outlying possessions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You could not under those circumstances make any reciprocity treaty at all with Canada.

Mr. BURTON. It would be practically impossible.

Because of the effect which any change in this agreement would have upon the favored-nation clause of many of our treaties, I do not feel we would be safe in modifying this agreement by amendments here. Let us take it for granted that the agreement adopted by the legislative bodies of the United States and Canada is the final document, yet the whole transaction, from the beginning of the negotiations to the end, including the original agreement, including communications, including that which is transmitted to Congress, is known to all these countries which have the favored-nation clause in their treaties.

Now, two facts are to be considered: First, according to the wording of every favored-nation clause, you would conclude that anything granted to any country would mean the granting of the same privilege to any nation having a treaty with the favored-nation clause. Against that we interpose the opinion of some of our public men, beginning with John Quincy Adams, to the effect that if an agreement with any nation contains equivalent concessions the favored-nation clause does not apply to other countries. We interpose a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to the same effect. But there is no universally accepted principle of international law to give adequate and altogether reliable support to our contention.

But there is more than that. It is desirable that we should avoid friction and irritation with other countries. I fear that there would be complaint and embarrassing assertions of claims by them if, after certain concessions had been agreed upon by the ministers or the administrations of the two countries, the Senate should put into the body of the agreement further concessions that were not agreed upon by the executive officers of either country or by the House of Representatives, nor asked by the other contracting party.

It is not sufficient that we have an agreement that is legal and binding, though about that there may be some doubt. It is altogether necessary that we should have, as well, something that is as far as possible in line with our diplomatic policy of avoiding cause of offense or dispute with other countries.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question before he passes to another subject?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will make the illustration as simple as I can. Suppose Canada wanted to come into the United States free with steel rails, and we were willing that Canada should come in with her steel rails free, and the ministers or the executive departments of the two Governments had agreed upon that, but when it comes here we look it over more carefully and we find that it would be very unjust to our manufacturers to allow steel rails to come in free unless we also allowed iron ore, the basic element of steel rails, to come in free. Does the Senator believe that under those circumstances the addition of iron ore to the free list would create——

Mr. BURTON. The Senator means iron ore brought into this country and steel rails into this country, both?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. Does the Senator believe it would create any friction between two intelligent Governments or would be in anywise a violation of the favored-nation clause if we should not permit iron ore to come in free from other countries?

Mr. BURTON. I should presume not, because there is an equivalency; that is, the raw material comes in free and the other article comes in free. A matter of equivalency does not depend upon an agreement by which a free importation goes into one country and some other free importation into the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the Senator from Ohio, I believe, sees a difference between the case I have just put and the case at hand, namely, Canada wants to come in with her agricultural products free? We say we are willing that they should come in free, but we can not allow you to come in free with your agricultural products unless we allow you to come in free with some other things the farmer must buy, in order to do justice to him. Does the Senator see any difference?

Mr. BURTON. If there is a case where the connection is so close as it is between iron ore, the raw material, and steel rails, I do not know that there would be. Even with that, however, I will say that it is best not to interfere with this agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator another question? Who will decline? Canada will not decline.

Mr. BURTON. Other countries, claiming that under the favored-nation clause they are entitled to bring their products in because we granted the right to Canada, and did it without any equivalent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the authorities I read this morning it would seem that the matter of equivalency was for our determination alone.

Mr. BURTON. It is a very rare controversy that can be settled by one person alone. We might assert our opinion about it, but the other side would have its right to a different opinion. In any event, it is likely to create a ground of variance between our own country and others. When this agreement was first published here there were rumors in the Capitol that some of the foreign nations were about to claim that if we made any such agreement they were entitled to the same concession.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Ohio. They are already complaining. They are complaining of the arrangement as it is now, and in my opinion much more justly than they could complain of it if we amended it as I propose.

Mr. BURTON. I do not quite agree with the Senator from Iowa in regard to that.

INJURIOUS RESULTS NEED NOT BE FEARED.

The essential fact to be remembered in a discussion relating to this agreement is the similarity of conditions between the United States and Canada. The cost of labor is very nearly the same in both countries. This is true notwithstanding in some portions both of Canada and the United States wages are higher than in contiguous or nearly contiguous localities across the border. But the fact remains that the general average is practically the same, and differences in wages in the two countries are not greater than in different localities in each. Indeed, in the newly developed portions in the northwestern part of Canada it must be conceded that wages are higher. The cost of implements both for use in agriculture and in manufacture is approximately the same. If the scale of living is different it is sure to become more and more nearly identical by reason of the close communication between the two countries and their similarity in habits and aspirations.

I am far from saying that tariffs should not be imposed where there are essential differences in the scale of wages and cost of living, but such differences afford no barrier to this agreement. Thus far I have conceded for the sake of argument that there may be some variance in the price of agricultural products. But it would be unwise to hold out the prospect that any material change in the cost of living will be accomplished by this agreement. Prices will be somewhat lower whenever there is scarcity by reason of deficient crops on the one side or the other. The multiplication of the sources of supply will aid in distribution and prevent those dangerous opportunities for monopoly or excessive profits to middlemen. Also in the case of specific articles of agricultural production the price may be lowered and the American farmer subjected to some slight degree of hardship. This hardship, however, will be confined to a limited number and to a small area. It is inevitable that the general result must be an approximation of prices in the two countries. In both countries some prices will be raised or lowered, though only in a slight degree.

I have already, in answer to questions, dwelt upon those facts. I will, however, refer to one illustration only. The argument has sometimes been advanced that eggs are 5 cents a dozen less at Windsor than at Detroit. While this difference in price has been denied, the absurd inference has been derived from it that a removal of the duty on eggs would cause the price at Detroit to fall 5 cents a dozen to the price at Windsor. A very superficial consideration of this situation shows that such can not be the case. In view of the very much more limited quantity of eggs available for export from Canada, it is perfectly plain that the Canadian price, if it is lower, would rise to the price in the United States. The same is true all along the line where the country has a small surplus for export. The new situation created by this agreement will cause that surplus to be sold at the price prevailing where the larger demand exists, and when the quantities are more nearly equal there will be an adjustment of prices influenced for the most part by the price of the larger quantity. It should further be considered that this question of prices can not be settled by trade relations between Canada and the United States alone. Both countries are large exporters of agricultural produce and the foreign demand which is sure to provide bidders for the exportable quantities in both countries will be the most potent factor in determining the price.

A leading article of export between the United States and Canada is coal. The last Statistical Abstract places the estimate of the value of coal taken into Canada at $26,000,000. It is probably about half or a little more anthracite, on which there is no duty. The duty now prevailing in Canada is 53 cents on bituminous coal per ton of 2,000 pounds. That is lowered from 53 cents to 45 cents. That is but an entering wedge to the removal of the duty on coal on both sides of the line. In view of the fact that so much of the cost of coal at the place of consumption consists of freight charges where distances are so considerable as in Canada, it seems to me that this duty can not permanently remain.

ADVANTAGES TO BE DERIVED FROM TREATY.

What are some of the advantages to be derived from this treaty? The obvious benefits are those which will result from more friendly relations and the general promotion of trade with Canada, both of which would be stimulated by the more amicable disposition manifested by an agreement of this kind. Also there are immediate advantages which can be figured from trade statistics. It is true that under the operation of this agreement it has been computed that duties remitted by the United States would amount to $4,849,933, while those remitted by Canada would amount to only $2,560,579.04, but we must take into account two facts: First, the exports from Canada into the United States are only $95,000,000, while those from the United States into Canada are $220,000,000, a balance of trade so great that it could only be expected that the one which is the larger buyer of the products of the other has a strong claim for greater concessions. Second, in nearly all cases our own duties are higher than those imposed by Canada. The agreement provides for three classes of commodities, arranged in four schedules. Schedule A includes those which are to be admitted free by both countries; Schedule B those admitted by each country at uniform rates of duties; Schedules C and D include articles admitted into one or the other country at specified rates of duty. As an example of the second class of duties, it is provided that flour shall be admitted into both countries at 50 cents a barrel; the present Canadian duty is 60 cents per barrel, while that of the United States is 25 per cent. In this case it is apparent that the duty in our country is much larger than in Canada. In a few cases the Canadian duties are higher.

The duty on fresh mutton and lamb and other fresh meats is now 3 cents per pound in Canada and 1½ cents per pound in the United States. Under the proposed reciprocal rates a reduction is made in both countries to 1¼ cents. The rate on bacon and hams shows a larger duty in the United States, 4 cents a pound, while the Canadian rate is only 2 cents; both alike are reduced to 1¼ cents per pound. The imports affected, according to the computation made, are somewhat in excess of $47,000,000 in both countries. Live animals, cattle, horses, hogs, and sheep are made free. The value of the exports of these animals shows a balance in favor of exports from Canada, though exports were made from the United States. What does this show? It is that the balance depends upon the question of supply in specific localities along the border. The exports are trivial when compared to the total number in either country. For instance, Canada last year sent into the United States horses to the number of 2,615; the total number in the United States in 1910 was 21,000,000. So small an exportation can hardly be expected to influence the price or profits of the American farmer. On the other hand the United States sent into Canada 6,518, as against a total of 2,132,489 in the latter country. It thus appears that the proportion of imports to the total number is much greater in Canada than in the United States. Among other articles admitted free, of which there is considerable exportation to Canada, we find cottonseed oil, on which the duty to be remitted by the agreement is $179,000 on a value of $895,000; clover and timothy seed of a value of $148,000 sent into Canada, on which a duty is to be remitted of $74,000. Among dutiable articles, meat products of the value of over two millions were sent to Canada, on which duties of $150,000 are to be remitted; lard, of a value of $1,347,000, on which duties of $218,000 are to be remitted. The exports of wagons and agricultural implements to Canada are very large, though the proposed remission of duties is not considerable, amounting to reductions from 20 and 17½ per cent to 15 per cent.

The proposed agreement will undoubtedly increase the trade between the two countries, especially in view of the growing demand in Canada. In the last year for which statistics are available coal of a value of $11,400,000 was sent into Canada, on which the duty to be remitted is $455,000. As the British possessions to the north of us have longer winters and presumably colder weather than in the United States, it is certain that the demand for coal will increase. In addition to bituminous coal a very large quantity of anthracite is exported to that country upon which no duty is levied. As already stated, the duty on bituminous coal by the agreement is reduced from 53 cents per ton to 45 cents, a substantial concession when we take into account the very considerable freight cost in the carriage of coal to Canada and the competition with coal fields on the Atlantic border.

Just as the acquisition of territory by the United States, as in the case of Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and California, has widened our commercial horizon and increased the prosperity of the older and newer portions alike, so reciprocal trade with Canada, where conditions are so similar, must confer a like benefit.

I am not unaware that powerful factors are at work which are likely to reduce somewhat the prices of agricultural produce. No organized movement back to the farm has commenced, but the very fact that there has been of recent years a disproportionate increase in the prices of farm products will cause greater attention to be given to agricultural production. This will be accomplished by improved methods, by obtaining larger crops per acre, and in some degree by an increase in the number of those engaged in farming. These tendencies, if they shall manifest their influence, will result from the operation of the law that capital and effort are directed toward those lines of enterprise which are most profitable. If such is the case, this agreement, when adopted, as I feel sure it will be, will receive the blame for lower prices from many of the farming population. However, if there should be a fall in prices, the true cause will be overlooked; and, further, the reduction will only last for a part of one of the cycles of increase or decrease in prices which have their course and then give place to a contrary tendency.

So long as the production of gold increases and the demands of the average citizen are maintained at the present standard, it is not probable that there will be any permanent decrease in the prices of grain or meats.

In addition to these causes there is another much more influential cause, to which I have already referred, namely, the disturbance of the balance between agriculture and other branches of industry. Whether the remedy for this will appear or not, no one can foresee with any certainty.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE, it was Ordered, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

GRAND CALUMET RIVER, ILL.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 2789) to change the location and straighten the course of the channel of the Grand Calumet River through the lands of the Gary Land Co. and the Indiana Steel Co., and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. OWEN. I give notice that to-morrow, after the speeches which have been set, I should like to be heard by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Following the Senators who have already given notice?

Mr. OWEN. Following the Senators who have already given notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator from Oklahoma indicate on what subject he intends to speak?

Mr. OWEN. On the subject of municipal government.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 6, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 5, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we bless Thee that in all the long march from savagery to civilization Thou hast never forsaken Thy children, but hast been with them to uphold, support, and guide to larger conceptions of Thee, duty, and destiny; that Thou didst pour Thyself out in light and love through Thy son Jesus Christ in the Sermon on the Mount and on the cross of Calvary, teaching the great truths fatherhood, brotherhood. We thank Thee for the strong, the noble, the true who caught that light and felt the warmth of that love and gave to us, a hundred and thirty-five years ago, the Declaration of Independence, which startled the world no less for its daring than for the principles it enunciated. Bold in its denunciation of wrong, clear in its declarations of right, it stands a masterpiece of civil, political, and religious liberty. God grant that, as American citizens, we may strive earnestly to fulfill in State and Nation the principles it proclaims. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 1, 1911, was read and approved.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House House joint resolution No. 39 and announces that the Senate asks for a conference. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution No. 39, proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House consent to the conference asked for. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement and agree to the conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] moves that the House further insist on its disagreement and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk announced the names of Mr. RUCKER of Missouri, Mr. CONRY, and Mr. OLMSTED as conferees on the part of the House.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the privileged House resolution No. 221. I believe the Clerk has it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] calls up House resolution No. 221, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 221.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House what action he has taken toward carrying out the provisions of the act approved February 17, 1911, providing for the acquisition in foreign countries of sites and buildings for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution. I will say that if the House will indulge me for 15 or 20 minutes, I will not care for a formal vote on the motion to-day.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Has this resolution been before the committee the proper length of time to make it a matter of privilege?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It has been before the committee almost two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 or 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, discussing the circumstances under which our country was settled, Green, the great English historian, wrote:

Between the sailing of Winthrop's expedition and the assembling of the Long Parliament, in the space, that is, of 10 or 11 years, 200 emigrant ships had crossed the Atlantic, and 20,000 Englishmen had found a refuge in the west.

Driven by a brutal abuse of royal power invading their individual rights as citizens, these sturdy men thus crossed the Atlantic to find homes in the wilderness amongst us. Therefore it is no wonder that as soon as we realized that we were Americans and not merely English colonists we were taught that the law surrounds each citizen with a circle of individual rights over which no government, State or Federal, or person, can pass without peril. The sturdy individualism emerging from such a system became the inspiration of a national character, receiving its initial impress from the simple conditions of life from which it sprang. The founders of our Nation were plain, heroic, and sincere men and women, preferring the dangers of the wilderness rather than groveling at the feet of despots.

Before the American Revolution had closed the Continental Congress, dealing with marine captures, acknowledged the law of nations by express adherence to the international doctrine that "according to the general usages of Europe" we should deal with such seizures. In thus declaring, we formally linked our national affairs to the diplomacy of the world. However, at an earlier date our diplomatists began to seek entrance at the doors of foreign nations. We note that on September 17, 1776, Congress proposed a plan of commercial treaty to be submitted to the King of France, Franklin, Jefferson, and Deane being appointed as commissioners for the purpose of laying it before the French Government. In December of the same year they addressed Count Vergennes, minister of foreign affairs of France, the first formal diplomatic document on behalf of the United States to a foreign power.

And it is historical that the French alliance resulting therefrom was the most important event of diplomacy occurring during the American Revolution. There was another treaty secured by the United States before peace with Great Britain, the one negotiated by John Adams at The Hague in October, 1792, with their "high mightiness, the States-General of the United Netherlands." Near that time the Continental Congress accredited other agents to other European courts. We sent William Lee to make explorations of diplomacy at Vienna, John Jay and William Carmichael were dispatched upon a similar quest to the Spanish Court, Ralph Izard to Tuscany, Henry Laurens to the Netherlands, and Arthur Lee was instructed to feel his way in various courts, along with that of Prussia. We sent Francis Dana to knock at the door of Russia.

At this juncture of our diplomatic history we may profitably dwell upon the trials and dangers besetting our diplomats in the days of the Revolution, when simplicity and hardship marked their careers, with an absence of opulence and oriental splendor. During those times our forefathers were mere "rebels" in the eyes of the British, and the voyage of an American diplomat across the seas was hazardous by reason of the British cruisers traversing the waters. The Reprisal, upon which Franklin sailed to France, captured two prizes on the way, and several times was menaced by suspicious sails. An eminent authority has said that in the event of the Reprisal's capture Franklin might have tested the truth of his famous remark in Congress to his colleagues, that they must "either hang together or hang separately." Adams made his first voyage on an American vessel and the second on the French frigate Sensible, landing in Ferrol, Spain. Before independence was achieved, Deane proceeded abroad in secret, and when his presence in France was discovered Great Britain demanded his seizure and delivery into her custody. Jay made a safe journey in the American man-of-war Confederacy; but Henry Laurens, sailing in 1780 to the Netherlands, was not so fortunate. Embarking in a small packet boat, Mercury, convoyed by the sloop of war Saratoga, when off the banks of Newfoundland the Mercury, abandoned by her convoy, was seized by the Vestal, a British cruiser. Laurens's papers during the pursuit were put in a bag and thrown overboard. However, of too light weight to sink, they were recovered and delivered to the British Government, and Laurens himself was promptly imprisoned in the Tower of London.

In this way I have endeavored to recall some of the almost forgotten incidents of the history of American diplomacy in order to "point a moral and adorn a tale." Let us not forget that these envoys had been a part of our early political life, contributed to our thought, our learning, our eloquence, our philosophy, and rise of the world's greatest Republic. They were not merely fortunate adventurers stumbling upon a pot of gold; they were not mere accidents thrown up by the plowshare of fate. They were leaders in opinion, in action, in genuine patriotism, who had won the right to speak for the infant Republic in foreign courts. Again, let us remember they braved perils in the discharge of their arduous duties with the sturdy simplicity and spirit of genuine Americanism. They were unheralded by royal pomp at the gates of Paris and London. There was no royal entry preceding their reception at gorgeous courts.

Having referred to the solemn entry of an ambassador into London, a survival of diplomacy now almost obsolete, we may congratulate ourselves that very recently as two proud and overopulent ambassadors entered that ancient capital amid a veritable riot of vulgar display and extravagance of wealth, rushing headlong to the feet of royalty, no serious casualties actually occurred. We should felicitate ourselves, because in other days in the terrific struggle for precedence between ambassadors on great occasions of public splendor armed conflicts frequently occurred. At least, as Americans we should be content that no fatalities resulted to our representatives in their wild scramble for kingly favors. [Laughter.]

In Ward's History of the Law of Nations we read a graphic account of the armed conflict at London, on Tower Hill, in 1661, between the retinues of the French and Spanish ambassadors by reason of each attempting to follow next to the King in the procession for the solemn entry of the representative of Sweden. Permit me to congratulate our ambassadors at the recent historic occasion in London that no serious bodily harm resulted to either in their ambitious desire to touch the throne, and to lament the fact that perhaps some permanent wound was left by reason of some other representative outvieing them in gorgeous and overlavish display in vulgar wealth, jewels, peacock feathers, and personal raiment so essential to such occasions. [Laughter and applause.]

And here we must admit that such overzealous glamor and show indicate a dangerous aspect of the new dollar diplomacy. Can any patriotic American who contemplates the rising tide of lavish and almost obscene extravagance, with its source springing from the coffers of the overrich, fail in the perception that it is rapidly undermining the foundations of every cottage in the Republic? As surely as death, with its impartial footsteps, approaches the doors of palatial abodes and cottages of the poor, so will the corrupting spirit of lavish display drag its withering trail over every home in the land. The penalty must be paid, and that penalty is the one due from folly to a diseased false pride. As a man must die when his arteries have lived out their day, so a nation can not flourish in a healthful state longer than the ideals that made it great. History does not record anything surpassing the sudden and intensely bacchanalian revel of extravagance and show into which our simple and serious people have been swept by the abnormal growth of tremendous fortunes and estates to the detriment of our purest and best ideals. These grotesque performances invite our pity rather more than a feeling of contempt. The most serious and corrupting aspect of the times is the tendency of our great millionaires, still professing admiration for our republican institutions, to shine in splendor as great noblemen in foreign courts. In their endeavor to pave the way for such royal status the world has been profoundly amused at the expense of this Nation by the so-called system of "international marriages," ofttimes secured by purchase in return for high-sounding titles accidentally held by thin-blooded nobleman. [Applause.] As an illustration of their progress up to date in that direction, the following extract is taken from the daily newspaper reports of June 22, as they published the honor roll in London:

MANY AMERICAN WOMEN AWARDED PLACES OF HONOR—UNITED STATES WELL REPRESENTED AMONG PEERESSES AT THE CORONATION.

LONDON, June 22.

America was well represented among the peeresses present at the coronation of King George and Queen Mary. Those entitled to seats in Westminster Abbey were Consuelo, Duchess of Marlborough, daughter of W. K. Vanderbilt, of New York; Maye, Duchess of Roxburghe, daughter of Ogden Goelet, of New York; Helena, Duchess of Manchester, daughter of Eugene Zimmerman, of Cincinnati, and wife of an Anglo-American, the Duke of Manchester being the son of the former Consuelo Yznaga, of Ravenswood, La.; Florence, Marchioness of Dufferin and Ava, daughter of John H. Davies, of New York; Elena, Countess of Donoughmore, daughter of M. P. Grace, of New York; Margaret, Countess of Suffolk and Berkshire, daughter of Levi Z. Leiter, of Chicago—

These names are hard to pronounce by one who has not been a special envoy to a coronation trade carnival [laughter and applause]—

Adela, Countess of Essex, daughter of Beach Grant, of New York; Cornelia, Countess of Craven, daughter of Bradley Martin, of New York; Beatrice, Countess of Granard, daughter of D. Ogden Mills, of San Francisco; Grace, Lady Newborough, daughter of Col. M. H. Carr, of Kentucky; Elizabeth, Lady Cheylesmore, daughter of F. O. French, of New York; Vivian, Lady Decies, daughter of George Gould, of New York; Lady Barrymore, former wife of the late Arthur Post, of New York; Romaine, Lady Monson, daughter of the late Gen. Roystone, of Medham, N. J.; Mary Louise Leith, of Fyvie, daughter of Derrick A. January, of St. Louis; Frances, Lady Ashburn, daughter of J. C. Donnelly, of New York; Leonora, Countess of Tankerville, daughter of the late J. G. Van Marter, of New York.

Permit me here to indulge the hope that the good day is coming when the position of the plain American citizen will be so lofty that puny princes of other countries will fade into deserved insignificance by just comparison. [Applause.] Then may we see this reign of international nuptial alliance, based upon a mongrel mixture of wealth and titles of nobility, run its course before an enlightened, world-wide sentiment. My duty would be unperformed if I did not pause to here shed a tear of sympathy with our scorned and discredited duchesses, countesses, and princesses. Behold this item of news from the public press, which meets our gaze:

Representative SABATH learns that despite the millions which we send along with our maidens and which enrich the thin-blooded nobility of Europe the compensation is not adequate. About the time they are crowning a king we discover that some of our heiresses who have bought little coronets can not wear them in the procession. Some obsolete rule or regulation is revived, and with gravity and solemnity they are relegated to the stands erected for the common people. A resolution introduced by Mr. SABATH directs the Secretary of State to inquire into the "humiliation" that title-bearing American women are forced to undergo; how many of these international alliances are being negotiated, and at what figures; whether any of the coronets are made of pewter or tin; and whether there is danger of "titleitis" becoming chronic.

[Laughter.]

Our hearts and tears should go out to these heiresses in their hour of trial, as their last hopes fade into the realm of cruel mockeries. But the designs of our overambitious plutocrats do not end there. They now demand the great diplomatic posts in the chief European capitals. There they have placed the scale of living so high that in some instances our envoys have installed themselves in viceregal magnificence. Sumptuous palaces and country estates have been taken, the rentals of which are so vast as to make the salaries paid by this Government appear utterly contemptible and exceeding 20 times the amount received from our Treasury as their official emoluments. Should not the blush of shame and anger come to the face of every true American when he realizes the dignity of this great Republic thus compromised and abased in foreign courts by envoys who maintain from their private purses a style of living characterizing the Government sending them as a mere mendicant? The time has come when this humiliating spectacle should be brought to a close by a decree coming from the hearts and minds of the true American citizens. Perhaps the trouble began by the failure of this Government to make proper provision for its representatives abroad.

All other governments have pursued such course by thus establishing homes for their envoys in foreign courts. That is the universal rule of all the more important governments. Europeans regard not so much the splendor of a diplomatic residence as the fact that it is the official home of the government maintaining it. An adequate home in any European capital provided by this Government for our envoy becomes, by reason of that fact alone, a place of the highest importance and dignity. After such house has been provided and equipped by our Government, the envoy, whether rich or poor, must reside in the style thus approved by his country. In this manner the new envoy immediately enters, upon his arrival, into a well-equipped home, the interior and exterior of which appear about the same, no matter whether its occupant is an historian or writer, like Bancroft, Motley, or Taylor, or a multimillionaire, able and eager to establish himself with his own accidental riches in Waterloo Palace or Devonshire House.

The Sixty-first Congress passed an act providing for the purchase or erection of official residences for our envoys in every European capital. And thus established in official homes by their Government, they can conduct and maintain themselves in simple and becoming dignity upon the salaries now fixed by our laws. In that fact is embodied the true essence of the whole problem. If the American democracy is not to become ashamed of its character as a great Republic, then we must maintain before the enlightened world the simplicity characterizing the beginning of our national life. In such cause we need not venture into extremes. There is no necessity for disregarding the larger duties which our position as a world power places upon us.

Establishments of viceregal splendor should be sternly discountenanced and every American envoy should be furnished, at governmental expense, an adequate official residence in which he can maintain the rank and dignity of his office out of his salary. To that end the last Congress passed an act, approved February 17, 1911, authorizing the Secretary of State to proceed at once to purchase or erect suitable buildings, "the cost of no one of which is to exceed, with the furniture, the sum of $150,000." As not more than $500,000 can be expended in any fiscal year, the act contemplates that three embassy or legation buildings shall be provided in each year.

The necessity is pressing that the Secretary of State should proceed at once to erect or purchase, especially at London, the recent scene of ambassadorial riot and glamor of wealth, a suitable building befitting our traditions as a Republic. He should hasten to comply with the law at Paris and Berlin, where the viceregal mania is pronounced and rapidly taking on a malignant form. The American public is entitled to know at this hour what steps the Secretary of State has taken to execute this recent act of Congress and thus arrest this nauseating display of splendiferous riches. As a representative of the people in the Congress of a democratic government I now formally invite him to give the appropriate information and proceed to the performance of his sworn duty. If there is any member of our diplomatic corps who is so sumptuous in his style and tastes that he can not reside in a house the value of which, including the furniture, shall not exceed $150,000, then let him promptly resign in order that we may fill the place by some real American citizen.

Only a short while ago, when one of our viceregal envoys who had lived in unsurpassed splendor at Berlin resigned, there was a rumor, oft published, that it was difficult to supply his place because no successor would be acceptable to the German Empire who could not maintain the same splendiferous status established by the departing ambassador of lavish wealth. Since the world's diplomacy began has such a requirement ever before been decreed from an imperial seat or kingly throne, fixing a test of vulgar wealth as the sine qua non of acceptability? As a social millionaire diplomat of the highest order is a necessity at Berlin, a worthy successor to the viceregal Charlemagne Tower may easily be found in the person of a new aspirant for diplomatic honors who, without any training or probation whatever, has lately crowned himself with glory at London. From his publicity bureau, whose organization seems to be perfect, we learn that at every turn even royalty itself actually fawned upon him. The following are only little fragments from the press with which the cable has favored us:

The Duke of Argyll, Princess Henry of Battenberg, Princess Louise of Battenberg, and Miss Campbell, a niece of the Duke of Argyll, were conspicuous to-day in a distinguished company of 125 persons who witnessed the royal progress from Stratton House, the residence of John Hays Hammond. A large American flag floated over the house. The royal party, with Mr. and Mrs. Hammond, occupied a window in the ballroom, and as King George and Queen Mary passed the monarchs recognized them and exchanged salutations—

The King and Queen are to be congratulated upon the ecstasy aroused in them by the sight of our important personages—

* * * Sir Edward Grey, the secretary of state for foreign affairs, as the host of the evening, escorted Queen Mary in to dinner, and King George acted as the escort of the German Crown Princess. John Hays Hammond escorted the Kaiser's sister. The dinner was served at nine tables. Mr. Hammond sat at the second table, at which sat also Queen Mary. Mrs. Hammond was at the third table, at which sat the Duke of Connaught. Mrs. Hammond was between King George of Greece and the Grand Duke Michael of Russia.

Perhaps we have found the envoy who is persona grata at the German court. Is it to be the multimillionaire of South African fame, whose face is now featured in every blaze of glory lighting up the London capital? Following a series of such circumstances an eminent scholar, with long training in our State Department, and one of the foremost diplomats of this country, was sent to Berlin. Alas, his career has been cut short! He resigned, and his resignation is shrouded in mystery. Is the solution found in the fact that he is not the required multimillionaire as his predecessor and probable successor? Mr. Speaker, what is the truth of this mysterious recall? The American people are entitled to know. In the above observations have I not touched the real explanation of this international secret? Has the time come when this mighty Republic must permit any foreign sovereign of the earth to impose such servile and mercenary conditions upon us? The Review of Reviews refers in its current number with anxiety to the rumor that Dr. David J. Hill had resigned in order to make it possible for "President Taft to appoint as his successor some millionaire social leader." God forbid that such a discount should ever be placed upon patriotism, scholarship, and accomplishments of diplomacy in recognition of riches and vulgar splendor.

Mr. Speaker, let us rather announce to the world that when the next elections have passed the American people will not put up these great posts of diplomatic honors to be plucked by the highest bidders amongst aspiring millionaires, but that the plain American gentleman of genuine accomplishments shall outrank them all. It is thoroughly understood that the eminent scholar, Dr. Eliot, who for many years guided the destinies of Harvard University, was offered the post of ambassador at London. He saw proper to decline. Perhaps the real reason for his declination is the fact that financial poverty made it necessary, although the world knows him to be rich in years, public esteem, and scholarship, admirably equipping him for the honor. If we are to continue as a Republic, and republican ideals are to be perpetuated as a part of our institutions, existing conditions in our Diplomatic Service must be changed at once and forever.

Let the Secretary of State promptly proceed at London, Berlin, and Paris to execute the provisions of the congressional enactment of this year. Let him there re-create conditions of republican dignity and thus revive memories of the days when our diplomacy was adorned by such names and simple characters as Franklin, John Adams, Jefferson, Jay, the Pinckneys, Monroe, Livingston, Dana, Washington Irving, Bancroft, Motley, Buchanan, Phelps, Robert Lincoln, and Thomas Francis Bayard. Throughout our entire history of diplomacy no more perfect type can be found of what the life of an American diplomatist should be than that exhibited in the person of the dignified Thomas Francis Bayard. His life there was simple and attractive, and his London house, furnished, cost scarcely £1,000 per annum. In that home the great of the world gathered—philosophers, historians, poets, statesmen, jurists, warriors, wits, and men of affairs. Amongst them all towered our stately and accomplished envoy, wearing upon his breast the noblest of all decorations—the dignified simplicity of an American gentleman, typifying the great democracy in which he was born. Invoking a return to that glorious day, let us direct the Secretary of State to proceed with the duty in hand. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, if there is any objection, I shall not ask that my motion to discharge the committee from further consideration of this resolution be put to-day, but if there is no objection I shall ask that the motion be put.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from further consideration of House resolution 221.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is not present to-day, and I do not know what his attitude might be toward this motion if he were here. I think it ought to be said, however, that the statute to which the gentleman from Texas refers was only enacted last February, about four months ago, and if the House now desires to require the Secretary of State to inform it as to what his action has been under it, I think it ought to be generally understood that he has had only four months in which to do anything about it.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman objecting?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no objection to that information being given.

Mr. KENDALL. Since I am on my feet, I think I ought to object to the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not a matter that the gentleman can object to.

Mr. KENDALL. I think, before it is adopted, there ought to be a quorum of the House present.

The SPEAKER. That is a very pertinent suggestion.

Mr. KENDALL. While that is an indirect way of objecting to the consideration of the resolution, I think it might be made very effective.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no objection to the resolution going over, and I will ask that it go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his resolution temporarily.

DRINKING WATER IN THE HOUSE WING OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report, and asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, Hon. Elliott Woods, be requested to arrange with the proper authorities to furnish cool water in the public drinking fountains in the corridors in the House wing of the Capitol for the use of visitors to the Capitol.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I doubt whether this is the proper way to accomplish the desired result.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves the right to object.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, if there ever was a time when the people ought to have cool water, this is certainly the time. My attention was called to this matter by stopping at the fountain immediately outside of the door of the House of Representatives one day last week. Over this fountain were the words "ice water." I took a drink of that water, and it was sickening warm. It was near the telegraph operator, and I asked him about it and whether this was the usual condition. He said, "It has been so all this summer." He said he had frequently seen ladies who were almost famished from thirst and heat stop at that fountain to get a drink of supposed ice water, and after drinking, it was so sickening warm that they were unable to retain it.

So it seems to me that this is a condition which ought to be relieved. The American people love to visit the capital of their country and every citizen ought to have the privilege and right to do so, and when he comes this Government ought to be big enough and generous enough and have pride enough to at least furnish him with cool water to drink when a visitor inside of this Capitol building. This is not intended as a criticism of anybody. I have talked to Superintendent Woods, and he says this condition ought to be relieved. This resolution has been drawn with his consent and approval. He says he has no objection to it, and if it is passed he will take it up with the proper authorities and see that cool water is furnished. I hope that the resolution will be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is not necessary in order to accomplish this very desirable reform that the House of Representatives should adopt this resolution. There must be some official whose duty it is to look after such matters. I shall ask the gentleman from Missouri to let the resolution go over until we can see whether this can not be accomplished without the House of Representatives solemnly resolving that some official be requested to confer with persons unknown to provide suitable drinking water in the Capitol. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his resolution for the present, or I shall object to it.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to inquire also whether the Superintendent of the Capitol has any funds out of which he can supply ice water?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, he says that he can supply it, if we would pass the resolution.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman from New York see to it that we get ice water in the meantime?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will make no promises as to what I shall do. I have a decided objection to the House requesting an official to do his duty, or asking him to help to have some other official perform his duty. It must be the duty of some person to provide proper drinking water about the Capitol, and it should be done without the House being compelled to ask it as a favor.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman from New York advise us who is the proper party?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am inclined to believe that the matter is either under the control of the Speaker, the Clerk of the House, or Superintendent of the Capitol. I object to the House requesting the Superintendent of the Capitol to hunt up the Speaker, if it should be his duty, or the Clerk of the House, if it should be under his jurisdiction. I believe that this little discussion will put all upon notice and proper inquiry will be made, and that probably the proper official will provide ice for the water furnished through that fountain.

Mr. RUSSELL. My impression is that it is the duty of the superintendent, if it is the duty of anyone.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, he should not be requested in a resolution of the House to confer with somebody else.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have conferred with him. I did not want to criticize him. I did not believe he deserved criticism, as his attention had not been called to it before. He suggested that he would like to have this resolution in this form, and said he had no objection to the resolution being passed, and he would be glad to take it up with the proper authorities if he was not the proper one to attend to it, and that it would be given prompt attention.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

EXPENDITURES IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department to make the following privileged but only partial report (H. Rept. 59), which I present for printing. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to discuss it at this time, but to call it up at some later day.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, is this a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama says that it is. The Chair is not informed as to the contents of the paper.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, the report is made under a resolution of the House, H. Res. 103, instructing these various committees to make investigations and reports.

Mr. DALZELL. I submit that the report is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution directs the committee to make the report, it seems to the Chair that it would be a privileged matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the gentleman from Alabama does not desire to call up the report at this time. He makes it now as a privileged report. That reserves all rights in the matter when the question is called up for consideration in the House.

Mr. DALZELL. The report will go to the calendar then?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I am in order but I desire to make this statement, if I may be permitted. When the committee met, the day the majority adopted this report, I was present as one of the minority, another minority member being absent. It was during the time when by common consent no business was coming up here, and I gave notice to the committee then that two members of the minority might desire to make a report, and I think it was understood that no objection would be made. I desire to make that statement because I think that two members of the minority, or at least one, will want to make a minority report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to make any request of the House?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I simply desire to give notice or ask leave that the minority may be permitted later on to file their views.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I think that some time limit ought to be put on the request; otherwise I have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, on that point I might say that I communicated with Mr. TILSON, who is the other member of the minority on the committee with me to whom I have reference. He has not been well, as I learn, and he did not know just when he would get back. There are some circumstances, too, that have unexpectedly come up that may forcibly call me away for a few days, and therefore I would ask that we be given 10 days.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEDEMEYER] asks unanimous consent that the minority members on the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department may have 10 days within which to file the minority views if they so desire. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This resolution will be printed and lie on the Speaker's table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL SATURDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House on the subject of the regulation of interstate commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on the subject of interstate and foreign commerce. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a bill, H. R. 12318, to amend section 4 of the act to regulate commerce, approved June 18, 1910, and in explanation of that bill I desire to say the following:

It has long been the rule of our railways to charge a less rate—sometimes less than half—on imported and exported goods than is charged where the goods are of domestic origin and destination. This principle, which was finally sanctioned as legal by the Supreme Court of the United States and held not to constitute an unjust discrimination, has lately been applied by the Interstate Commerce Commission in construing the new long and short haul clause. They hold that in judging of their reasonableness import and export rates will be compared not with domestic rates but with other import and export rates. This leaves the carriers to do practically as they please as to these rates. This policy of charging less for the same service where the article carried either originates or is destined for a foreign port is a violation of the rule of equality, but may be wise and economically justified in order to find markets abroad for our products and to give the different rival ports and sections of our country an opportunity to compete for their natural share of the transoceanic business.

The reason for this exception from the rule of equality does not, however, apply to railway traffic local to this continent. Such railway traffic should be treated, at least so far as imports are concerned, the same as domestic traffic. This is the object of my bill, the essential part of which is an amendment of section 4 of the interstate-commerce act, and reads as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge a higher rate for the transportation of property imported into the United States from any point on the continent of North America than for a like service where the whole distance is within the United States, and in determining the reasonableness or discriminatory character of such an import rate it shall be compared with domestic rates.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice from the quotation the gentleman has just read from his bill that the amendment applies only to traffic on the Western Continent and would not apply to shipments to Europe, for instance. What is the reason for confining it?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think I will explain the reason. I did not want to make any greater change than the circumstances under which we are now to act require. I think the reason will be apparent, if the gentleman will allow me to proceed.

Unless such a rule is adopted railway management, influenced by the economic law of increasing returns, will result in unjust discrimination against our own citizens and industries. Discriminatory railroad rates on lead and zinc ores has heretofore put the mines of Missouri and Colorado out of business in spite of a considerable customs tariff and necessitated the raising these duties in the Payne law. What would become of these industries if we had free trade with Mexico, as is proposed on the north?

With free trade in farm products between here and Canada there would be an irresistible inducement for our railroads to divert the traffic, especially the grain trade, from the Canadian roads to ours, and in order to do so they would grant such lower rates of transportation as might be necessary to secure the increased tonnage.

Under the influence of this policy Canadian hard wheat would tend to supply the whole American demand for the best flour, and our domestic wheat would have to find a market abroad. The railroads would thus get the increased tonnage and the longest haul, both on the imported wheat and on our domestic crop, the exportation of which would be largely increased.

The American farmer might be, and in many cases would be, charged more, even twice as much, in proportion to the haul as the Canadian, but he could not complain. Railways, privately owned and managed solely for the purpose of earning large dividends for the investors, can not be expected to consider the larger questions of public interest and economic waste involved in such unjust discrimination and useless transportation, but this is the very reason why the legislative power should be put forth to curb this tendency and modify this policy, which necessarily results in foreigners being treated better and more favorably than our own citizens. It goes without saying that our Government should see to it that our own people get at least an equal show with foreigners in our markets, and an equal opportunity to earn a living here with those beyond our borders, but unless such a law as I have proposed shall soon be enacted it will inevitably result in unjust and unreasonable discrimination against our own country and its citizens and its industries and the enrichment and upbuilding of a country foreign to us and over which we exercise no dominion.

Imports of articles we ourselves produce, except in the form of raw materials intended for re-export as finished articles, are not to be favored. They compete with and displace our own labor and lessen the opportunity of domestic industry and thrift. Exports, on the other hand, are, under a wise policy, to be favored, because they increase our opportunities for industry and thrift by finding a market for our products. This undoubtedly is the reason why our Constitution authorizes customs taxes to be levied upon imports while it expressly forbids their imposition upon exports.

I think that answers the question the gentleman from Nebraska put awhile ago that, as a general rule, the policy of granting lower rates for imports and exports to foreign countries, especially countries beyond the sea, may be necessary and may be justifiable, but especially justifiable in regard to exports, because that is an effort to find a market for the labor of our citizens and cheap rates of transportation to foreign countries help the development of our country. That is the reason I believe why the Constitution makes this distinction in the theory of taxation between exports and imports. It authorizes the imposition of taxes upon imports, but does not do so on exports.

I want to limit this rule of lower rates for exports and imports to that class of traffic which goes beyond the seas. I say that so far as imports of goods which we ourselves can produce and do produce are concerned coming onto the North American Continent, subject to railway carriage principally, the rate ought to be the same as the domestic railway rate.

This wise policy, intended to benefit our own people, embedded in the fundamental law of the land should not be permitted to be set at naught and nullified by our common carriers, governed alone by the narrow, selfish policy that looks to augmentation of tonnage and increased dividend alone as the ultimate end. Selfishness must give way to the general welfare.

I am not radical enough to say that the rate should be the same upon export and import business as upon domestic business. My bill only goes to this extent, that upon imports originating on this continent, the whole North American Continent shall be considered as one country, and that the rates on imports originating outside of the United States, upon this continent should be considered for the purpose of transportation rates, the same as if they originated within the United States, so that where complaint is made of unjust discrimination, as we might imagine the case of complaint against a railroad transporting zinc and lead ores from Mexico, where the labor is cheap, to compete with the miners of Missouri or Colorado, transportation in that case should be the same and the rates should be the same; otherwise we would allow our railroads to discriminate against our own citizens and destroy their opportunity of earning a living.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that the last statement made by the gentleman is true—and I think it is—why does not it apply to rates that originate in Europe as well as rates that originate in Mexico or in Canada?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, it does not apply to the same extent for the reason that it is necessary to have low rates to foreign ports beyond the seas in this transoceanic business in order to have a market for our own goods, and if we have low rates upon those exports then we have to consider also the return load.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I must object to that. If the gentleman desires five minutes additional time, I have no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether it could be done in five minutes, but I think the gentleman has opened up an interesting question here; but first I would like to have him explain to the House just what particular decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission has been rendered since the passage of the last law on the subject which makes it necessary for the amendment which he has suggested?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is not a decision. It is printed in one of the reports of the commission that construed the act of June 18, 1910.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it——

Mr. STEENERSON. It is not a new rule at all. It simply applies the old rule of construction to the new short-and-long-haul clause. It has always been the rule that a different rate may be charged upon export and import business, and a lower rate upon that business than the domestic, and that has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, I know that; but I understood the gentleman to say that since the passage of the last law the Interstate Commerce Commission had, in effect, held that the long-and-short-haul clause should not apply to import and export rates, or, at least, that they should not be compared with domestic rates in applying that law which we passed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Exactly. They say that in construing the reasonableness of export and import rates they will be compared with other import and export rates and not with domestic rates. That is printed, and I will give the gentleman the book in which it is printed.

Mr. NORRIS. I would be glad to read it.

Mr. STEENERSON. It was handed to me by the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to call the gentleman's attention, however, to the state of facts that was developed when we had that bill under consideration in the House and also before the committee. I think I can illustrate it by the rates that were charged on pottery by the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; that is a familiar case.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Now, does the gentleman think that ought to be permitted? We supposed that we had provided a remedy to that difficulty when we passed that law. They were making rates on pottery from Europe to Chicago, say, or to Denver, that were much cheaper than the Pennsylvania Railroad would make from Ohio on that road.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will answer that point by saying that that is a bigger change in the law than I was going to advocate, although I have no objection, when this bill is under consideration, to taking it up. But I was going to provide a remedy for a difficulty that is to become very imminent, because in the event of the bill for free trade in farm products with Canada becoming a law we will be in the midst of those discriminatory rates. We will be flooded with them.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the gentleman on that; but I do not understand why he will not apply the principle to all rates.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not want to apply it to more than the evil with which we contend.

Mr. NORRIS. The evil will apply to rates across the sea just as well as rates between the United States and Canada and rates between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is a greater reason for the rates fixed in trans-Atlantic business than for the rates with continental America.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; but the same principle applies, and a great deal of evil will result if the law is going to be construed as the gentleman seems to think.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thank the gentleman from Nebraska and the House, because I wanted to call the attention of the House to this matter, which will affect us in an important and vital place.

I insert the following from page 96 of Conference Rulings of Interstate Commerce Commission, issued April 1, 1911:

DECEMBER 17, 1910.

299. Application of section 4, as amended June 18, 1910, to export and import rates: (a) Inland export and import rates are subject to the provisions of the act and within the jurisdiction of the commission.

(b) The fourth section of the amended act forbids carriers subject thereto, without authority from the commission in accordance with said section, to charge more for the transportation of a like kind of export or import traffic for a shorter than for a longer haul over the same line in the same direction; that is, as we understand the law, the validity of a rate under this section is determined by comparison of an export rate with an export rate, or an import rate with an import rate.

(c) So far as the fourth section is concerned, carriers are not required in the first instance to establish export and import rates which shall be measured and limited by domestic interstate rates between the same points of origin and destination in the United States; but as export and import rates, as well as domestic interstate rates, are subject to the provisions of the act and the jurisdiction of the commission, it is clear that the reasonableness of any of these rates under the provisions of section 1, and questions of discrimination under the third section, may all be considered and the commission may condemn any discrimination in export and import rates, upon comparison with those applicable on domestic interstate traffic, to the extent that the same may be found unjust or unreasonable in any particular case upon investigation and full hearing.

(Section 4 as amended is also interpreted in rules 293 and 304.)

ADMINISTRATION OF PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the unanimous consent of the House to address the House for 12 minutes upon House resolution No. 228.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 12 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from California is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, on July 1, 1911, I introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands, or any subcommittee thereof which may be appointed by the chairman of that committee, is hereby authorized—

First. To make an investigation of the administration of the public-land laws with reference to the prospecting, locating, appropriating, listing, entering, relinquishing, certifying, and patenting of homestead, timber and stone, mineral, and desert-land claims, and to the occupancy, use, improvement, and development of such claims upon the public lands, reserved and unreserved.

Second. To make an investigation of the administration of the public-land laws with reference to the ownership and use by citizens, corporations, and municipalities of rights of way over the public lands, reserved and unreserved, for the diversion and beneficial use of water, and for canals, ditches, pipe lines, flumes, dams, reservoirs, highways, trails, and tramways, and telephone, telegraph, and transmission lines.

Third. To report at the second session of the Sixty-second Congress whether settlers, agriculturists, prospectors, miners, and mineral claimants have been denied, or unjustly interfered with in the enjoyment of, rights and privileges guaranteed to them under the public-land laws or have been caused unnecessary and unauthorized annoyance and expense in the use, occupancy, improvement, development, and patenting of their claims; also whether persons, corporations, and municipalities have been denied, or unjustly interfered with in the enjoyment of, rights and privileges guaranteed to them under the public-land laws in connection with the use of water and rights of way, or have been caused unnecessary and unauthorized annoyance and expense in connection therewith; also whether the settlement and development of the public-land States of the West is being unnecessarily retarded and their industries adversely affected by improper or inadequate laws or by present methods of administration of existing laws.

Fourth. That the chairman of said committee and the members thereof detailed to investigate any phase of said matters may compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers, administer oaths to and examine witnesses, and sit during sessions of and during recesses between sessions of the Sixty-second Congress. The said committee may authorize the chairman thereof to appoint a subcommittee of three members to sit and act at such times and places in the public-land States of the West as may be necessary for the purposes above enumerated.

On that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the resolution contemplates a general investigation by the Public Lands Committee of the administration of the public-land laws and of the conditions in the Western States to which those laws are applied. There are no particular axes to be ground, and no fight against any office, officer, or person is contemplated. The resolution carries with it no appropriation, and no expenditure of public moneys is planned except in one contingency. It is desired that the Public Lands Committee be given authority to conduct an investigation and hold hearings here in Washington. If from such hearings the committee becomes convinced that there should be an investigation made upon the ground of certain particular cases and of conditions in different localities in the Western States, then, by virtue of the provisions of the resolution, the committee could authorize its chairman to appoint a subcommittee of three members to sit and act at suitable places in the public-land States of the West. In that event, however, it would be necessary for another resolution to be introduced and passed by the House providing for an appropriation sufficient to cover the expenses of the subcommittee.

The necessity for the appointment of such subcommittee can not be determined in advance, but it is evident already that the Public Lands Committee, as a whole, should be authorized to conduct an investigation for the purpose of familiarizing itself with the causes and conditions which are producing such general complaint in the West.

A great number of complaints have been coming from the citizens of all the public-land States, protesting against alleged hardship, injustice, and inequality in the operation of the public-land laws. The complaints received have not been restricted to any one class. They have come from homestead and desert land claimants, from prospectors and the locators of mining claims, from municipalities and companies supplying power and water to municipalities, from irrigators and from irrigation companies, from operators of mines, mills, and reduction works, and from those living East as well as West who have invested in mining, irrigation, and water-power development.

For example, there are, I believe, no less than eight or nine separate and distinct right-of-way statutes of general application now on the statute books, and yet there is absolutely no provision of law by which an easement may be secured across the public lands for a telephone line. Business investment and enterprise are discouraged and seriously retarded by the maze of doubt and uncertainty surrounding this whole general subject of rights of way across the public lands and by the constant menace and threat of litigation if any move is made. Complaint is made repeatedly also that there is a tendency on the part of some Government agents and officers to penalize and to question the motives and integrity of those who wish to take such questions into the courts for adjudication. This is a very serious complaint and should be sifted to the bottom, especially in view of the circumstances in which honest men must find themselves in considering the legal phases of the situation. The scope and effect of many of the statutes when considered singly and the effect of some of the later ones upon those passed previously remain unadjudicated. Not only the scope and effect of these laws in a general sense but even the significance of many of their most important words and phrases remain undetermined. They refer in terms to railroads, reservoirs, canals, ditches, pipe lines, flumes, dams, highways, trails, tramways, and transmission and telegraph lines, and yet the purport and logical effect of a recent ruling by the standing master in chancery of the United States Circuit Court at San Francisco would seem to be that rights of way across the public lands of the West can no longer be secured even by irrigation companies or for transcontinental railroads.

Congress some six years ago enacted a statute apparently granting rights of way for reservoirs, ditches, pipe lines, tunnels, and canals for municipal, mining, milling, and ore-reduction purposes. Now complaints, serious complaints, are heard that this statute has been so stripped and whittled away by construction and application that its beneficial objects and purposes are utterly defeated. I do not say that these complaints are true or well founded, but I do say that they are seriously important to the western people and that they are worthy of careful attention and thorough investigation at the hands of the Public Lands Committee.

There are many complaints lodged also by miners, homesteaders, and desert-land claimants to the effect that the practice and decisions have tended of late years to handicap needlessly and unnecessarily to annoy and harass those who have faithfully and honestly complied with the public-land laws. Perhaps the most violent of these protests have come from the miners. The National Mining Congress last year added also its official protest, I am informed. It is alleged that the prospecting and development of mineral districts is being seriously retarded, and that many of those who have for years been engaged in mineral exploration and development along thoroughly legitimate lines are being discouraged and driven to forsake that pursuit because of unnecessary or technical obstacles.

I do not know what the truth or falsity of any of these charges may be, but I do know that very many complaints have come to me from thoroughly reliable and trustworthy sources, and I consider that no subject is more important to the general public or more worthy of the attention of Congress than this subject of the settlement and improvement of our Western States and the reasonable and proper use and development of the resources of our public domain.

A full and fair investigation with opportunity for the hearing and sifting of these complaints by the Public Lands Committee will, I believe, tend to clear away the confusion and disputation and ill feeling which exists at present. I favor heartily the protection and conservation of our natural resources, but I believe that we should first take steps to inform ourselves as to what the present existing conditions actually are. Such a course will also be productive of a better understanding and of better feeling that will make effective the conservation of our natural national resources and a progressive upbuilding policy, honestly and economicaly enforced, that we control our natural resources and use them now—in the present—but still control them so the future use of them will be saved for the people of this Nation. Keep them from the hands of the few. [Applause.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PERKINS presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Merchants' Exchange of San Francisco, Cal., relative to the fixing at an early date of tolls to be charged for passage through the Panama Canal, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of Southington, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. RAYNER presented a memorial of Elizabeth Grange, No. 135, Patrons of Husbandry, of Cortner, Md., and a memorial of Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Medford, Md., remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOURNE presented a memorial of Cedar Grove Grange, No. 320, Patrons of Husbandry, of Columbia County, Oreg., remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 93) thereon. I give notice that I shall call up the bill for consideration later in the day or to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. LODGE on May 11, 1911, proposing to appropriate $46,491.95 in settlement of the accounts of Paymaster John W. Morse, United States Navy, etc., intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY, from the Committee on the Census, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 94) thereon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent to file the views of the minority on the apportionment bill reported from the Committee on the Census. I am prepared to file the views at this time, but some members of the committee whom I hope to have join in the report are absent from the city, and therefore I ask leave to file that report later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks permission to file at a later date the views of the minority upon the apportionment bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2518) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 95) thereon.

REPORT OF MONETARY COMMISSION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think it is proper in this order of business to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Finance Committee. In the early days of the session I introduced a bill (S. 854) requiring the Monetary Commission to make a final report on or before the first day of the next session of Congress, and also providing for the discharge or dissolution of the commission the day after the meeting of Congress.

I think it is universally felt throughout the country that a commission which was organized more than three years ago for the purpose of presenting a measure to avert financial panics in the future should make a report, so that we may be provided with the material which will enable us to act speedily at the next session of Congress upon this very important subject.

I ask the chairman of the Finance Committee when, in his opinion, we may expect a report upon the bill I so introduced.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there is no disposition on the part of the Finance Committee not to give consideration to the bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa. It would only seem natural to confer with the chairman of the Monetary Commission. There is indirect information that he will be prepared to report in any event next December. My information has been that he is expected almost any day in Washington. I will make a further effort to communicate with Mr. Aldrich, and I assure the Senator from Iowa that I will call a meeting of the committee next week and then take the matter up for consideration. There is no disposition whatever to delay it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to have this assurance from the chairman, because there is no reason for delay. It is a very plain matter, and it is highly necessary not only that we act upon the subject at the next session, but it is equally necessary that we relieve the Treasury of the United States from the burden of this commission.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WORKS:

A bill (S. 2949) to establish a hydrographic station at Los Angeles, Cal.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2950) granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Hubbs (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURNHAM:

A bill (S. 2951) granting an increase of pension to Joshua Pinkham; and

A bill (S. 2952) granting an increase of pension to John H. Doeg; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2953) to grant an honorable discharge to George P. Chandler; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2954) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Belcher; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RAYNER:

A bill (S. 2955) granting an increase of pension to Barbara E. Brown (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

NEW STATES AND CONSTITUTIONS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have an address delivered before the law school of Yale University on Monday, June 19, 1911, by Hon. George W. Wickersham, Attorney General of the United States, on the subject of new States and constitutions. I move that the address be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 62.)

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for a print of House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States as passed by the Senate showing the Senate amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order for a print of House joint resolution 39 as passed by the Senate is entered.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call attention to Order of Business 67, Senate bill 2761, reported from the Committee on the Philippines with amendments, Report No. 83. I ask that it be referred back to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the following bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Philippines.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2761) to amend an act approved February 6, 1905, entitled "An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled 'An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' and to amend an act approved March 8, 1902, entitled 'An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' and to amend an act approved March 2, 1903, entitled 'An act to establish a standard of value and to provide for a coinage system in the Philippine Islands,' and to provide for the more efficient administration of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if there is any objection on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the reference of the bill again to the committee?

Mr. HEYBURN. The committee has considered this matter. There is no occasion for making special notice of the fact that the bill was reported by the Senator from Massachusetts. The committee have agreed that it should go back to the committee. I see some members present.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire, being a member of that committee, as I had not heard anything about this reference, what is the purpose of it?

Mr. HEYBURN. The committee reported a measure for regulating the financing of the construction of railroads and public works in the Philippine Islands. After the report was made it was discovered that it was impossible to procure the consideration of the financial agencies at all. We will reconsider it, when they shall appear before the committee, as the committee may have time. But the request comes from the department in charge of the Philippine affairs. I think the Senator, being a member of the committee, understands the matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand the amendments suggested, of course. I was very much in favor of those amendments, which I understand the financiers object to.

Mr. HEYBURN. They do. They will not even consider the proposition. The committee will have to hear them and reconsider the matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. I suppose the bill will have to go back to the committee, probably, and be fought out there, and, perhaps, afterwards on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. We could make no headway here at all. We had just as well send the bill back to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason I brought the question up was on account of the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts. I have no objection to the recommittal of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is utterly impossible for us to gather what is going on. The Chair asked if there was objection, but we do not know what the request is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asked unanimous consent to recommit to the Committee on the Philippines Senate bill 2761, which has heretofore been reported and is now upon the calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on the Philippines.

CONSTITUTIONS OF ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I will submit some observations on the New Mexico and Arizona constitutions, with special reference to the initiative, referendum, and recall. (H. J. Res. 14.)

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the notice given by the Senator from Utah leads me to inquire of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] if he knows when the report of the Committee on Territories is likely to be filed. The chairman of the committee being absent and the senior Senator from Minnesota being the ranking member, I make the inquiry of him.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have no information on that point. As the Senator from Kansas knows, I dissented from the report of the majority of the committee. There were three of us who were opposed to the report of the majority of the committee, and I stated to the chairman that I would orally state my objections at the time he reported the bill; but I do not know when he is going to report the bill. In that matter I do not represent the majority of the committee; I represent simply a minority.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask some Senator on the Committee on Territories, as the chairman of the committee does not seem to be present, whether the bill admitting New Mexico and Arizona has been acted on by the committee and when it is likely to be reported to the Senate?

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Missouri I desire to say that the Committee on Territories two weeks ago last Saturday instructed the chairman to report favorably the bill admitting these Territories. As stated a moment ago by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], there were three members of the committee who expressed themselves against the views of the majority. Why the report has not yet been submitted I do not know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to submit some remarks upon the bill (S. 1) to establish a department of health, and for other purposes. I am very sorry to interrupt the discussion upon the pending measure providing for reciprocity with Canada, to which Senators have given such great attention and in which they seem to be so deeply and profoundly interested. I am moved, however, to speak upon this subject at the present time by some remarks that were made by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] a few days ago on the same subject. What the Senator himself said was very brief and called for no reply. He took that occasion, however, to read into the records of the Senate articles that had been published in Collier's Weekly and in the Journal of the Medical Association that do call for prompt answer. In order that the views of the Senator from Oklahoma may be understood, I desire to quote briefly from the speech that he made on that occasion. He said:

> Great and organized opposition to the establishment of a department of health has been carried on by a so-called League for Medical Freedom. This league has many good people in it who are misled—Christian Scientists who deny disease, and some good citizens who have been falsely led to believe their liberty will be invaded—some people who do not think, and some people who have an evil purpose, a sinister commercial purpose, who are engaged in promoting patent medicine.

Again, he said:

> Mr. President, I opened my remarks by saying that there were many most excellent people who were members of the League for Medical Freedom, so called, many of whom are Christian Scientists, who are osteopaths, who are homeopaths, people for whom I have the highest respect, but this description of this league and its officers by Collier's deals directly with the individuals at the head of this organization and points out who those directors are.

Still further he said:

> Mr. President, the membership of this so-called league, in my judgment, have been deliberately misled by sinister interests, and the membership which has been thus added to these alleged rolls of membership has no means of expressing itself. The expression comes through its officers. Those officers are described by Collier's, and I think it would be well for the membership of that organization to look to the directors and see who they are and understand what is at the bottom of this movement. That is the purpose of my reading into the RECORD the history of this so-called organization.

I desire also to read very briefly from the editorial read into the RECORD by the Senator from Oklahoma. This is not from Collier's, it will be understood, but from the Journal of the American Medical Association:

I want to say right here that in my State half-page advertisements in huge letters were spread all over that State by this so-called League for Medical Freedom, practically denouncing the medical profession of this country as being a "medical trust," desirous of depriving citizens of their rights to employ any physician they pleased, to use any medicine they pleased, and giving it to be understood that the purpose of a department of health was the invasion of the private home of the citizen and the invasion of the constitutional rights of the State. The members of the so-called League for Medical Freedom have been grossly imposed upon and have been grossly misrepresented as to what they truly stand for. I know what many of their members stand for perfectly well, and I am in accord with them cordially and sincerely. I know what the Christian Scientists stand for, and I sympathize with them; I understand what the osteopaths stand for, too, and I think they serve a good and useful purpose. They have been misled by the agents of the patent-medicine association in this country, that are actively engaged in promoting the drug habit in our citizens, and this declaration on the part of the so-called League for Medical Freedom against the American Medical Association is not only unjust and unfair, but it is disgraceful and utterly untrustworthy.

WHO ARE OPPOSING THE BILL.

Mr. President, it will be seen that complaint is made that the League for Medical Freedom is not acting in good faith, but that it is being used for sinister and mercenary purposes by manufacturers and dealers in patent medicines. I am quite sure from the well-known views of the Senator from Oklahoma that he would not for a moment justify any act of oppression such as is attempted in this case through the columns of Collier's, knowing as I do that he stands the champion of the rights of the people and civil liberty. Therefore in what I expect to say with respect to these publications and their utterances I am not treating them as the utterances of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. President, this is an important subject. It is one that calls for the utmost frankness in dealing with it. I know how much the Senator from Oklahoma has at heart the measure that he is pressing for consideration before the Senate, and I desire to say that I respect his views in regard to that matter, but I differ from him wholly.

I am going to discuss this question from the standpoint of a Christian Scientist, and in order that the Senate may better understand and appreciate that point of view I am going to give you in just a few words my own personal experience with Christian Science healing.

Ten years ago I was a scoffer at Christian Science; I derided and ridiculed the claim of the Christian Scientists to heal disease; but the time was to come, and that very soon, when I was to put those pretensions and claims to the test. I had been an invalid and a great sufferer from a complication of diseases for many years. During the last year before I came to Christian Science for help those diseases took on an acute form and I suffered intensely night and day. In that space of time I lost 30 pounds in flesh and had become correspondingly weak. I was unable to do my day's work. I felt that the time had just about come when I should be compelled to give up my work and that death was near at hand. I had tried all schools of medical physicians; I had gone to what is known as the old school or the regular school of physicians; I had tried the homeopathic physicians. I finally went for relief to the osteopaths, who conceived the idea that my sufferings and the headaches which I had endured all that time were the result of the displacement of one of the vertebræ that pressed upon the spinal cord and caused all of my troubles. I obtained no relief from any of these sources. I am not here for the purpose of criticizing the work that was done by the physicians. They did the very best they could for me, and one and all of them worked conscientiously in the effort to relieve me from my troubles. They were competent men in their professions; I have not in anything that I may say here any word of condemnation or criticism to pass upon the physician who was doing his work conscientiously as such; but I found that my relief did not lie there.

I had said that, while I had no faith in it, while, as I said a few moments ago, I scoffed at the very idea that such diseases as mine could be cured by Christian Science, if everything failed, then I would try that remedy. I did so; and from the time that I commenced taking the treatment I began to improve, and that improvement was steady day by day for the space of about four months, when I could say to myself that I was completely healed. I had come up out of that condition of suffering and distress day by day just as I had gone down into that condition day by day in the years that had passed.

My wife, who had been an invalid for 15 years or more, at my earnest solicitation commenced to take the treatment at the same time that I did. She had been told—something that is nowadays almost inevitable in cases like that—she had been told that the only thing which could relieve her from her condition was the surgeon's knife. She was healed of that condition in three treatments by Christian Science, and from that time until now, almost nine years, she has been a comparatively healthy woman.

But the one thing that seemed to appeal to us more than anything else, in our experience, was the fact that our son was healed of the drink habit that had fastened upon him after he had arrived at manhood and had completely taken possession of him, so that we took him into our home and nursed him like a child. After our experience in Christian Science, naturally we undertook to induce him to resort to the same remedy, but, like thousands of others, he was not willing to accept it; he was not willing even to give it a trial until almost a year after we had had our experience. When he was just recovering from the effects of one of the prolonged spells of drinking to which he was addicted, he said one morning to his mother: "I know what Christian Science has done for you and father; I have always believed that I could overcome this habit of my own will, but now I give it up. If you desire, you may call a Christian Science practitioner."

We called a Christian Science practitioner that day, and he has not taken a drink of liquor from that time until now, almost seven years; and, best of all, while he had struggled against the habit, while he had at one time overcome it for the length of 11 months, yet the desire for it, the torture of the appetite, was with him every day. But when he had taken the treatment that desire for drink was completely and absolutely destroyed, and has never returned. Mr. President, that is the experience of one family in Christian Science. It is the experience in greater or less degree of hundreds of families in this country.

I fancy I hear Senators saying to themselves it is all a delusion; but I want to say to Senators that if it is, I hope that delusion will not be dispelled. It has brought health and happiness and contentment into hundreds of families in this country. It is doing that sort of work every day, day by day, healing the sick, saving men and women from suffering and sin, and in thousands of instances has saved them from the surgeon's knife, the resort to which is so common at the present time.

Mr. President, Christian Scientists do not claim to be perfect in their work of healing disease—not by any means. There has been but one perfect Healer on earth. Even His own disciples failed sometimes and met with the rebuke from Him, "Oh, ye of little faith."

I want to say to Senators that Christian Scientists are in no sense hostile to the medical profession, as is very generally believed. You have never found them in any single instance opposing any sort of legislation that tends to increase the efficiency of the medical profession, of whatever school it may be. We recognize the fact that there is work for all of us to do. We recognize the fact that the medical profession in their different schools are doing a great work in alleviating human suffering and healing disease. Therefore it is no part of the work of a Christian Scientist to interfere in any way whatever with the work of the medical profession.

I want to add that in whatever I may say in criticism of what has taken place on the part of the American Medical Association I am not criticising individuals. I reckon among my very best friends, and men for whom I have the highest possible respect, some of the men who are in the medical profession in this country, and I appreciate the work they are now doing in ameliorating human suffering.

Mr. President, the first thing to which I desire to address myself is the claim made in the articles that have been read in the RECORD by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], that the League for Medical Freedom is, if not made up by, actually influenced and controlled by selfish interests, by the vendors and manufacturers of patent medicines.

I want right in the beginning to deny that assertion emphatically and without qualification. I know something about the composition of the League for Medical Freedom. I know that the people who are standing behind that league and undertaking to prevent the kind of legislation that is sought here in Congress and throughout the States are people who are simply standing for the principle that every sort of healing medium, whether it be the doctors of this profession or that profession, this school or that school, or whatever it may be, shall have the right and freedom to exercise their rights as American citizens in that direction as well as all others. It is for the very reason that the American Medical Association has for the past 20 years been seeking legislation in the various States of this country that would shut out and prevent the exercise of the power of healing disease on the part of others that this opposition has arisen, and for no other reason.

Mr. President, as to the composition of the League for Medical Freedom, I desire first to call attention to an extract from the address of ex-Gov. Bates, of Massachusetts, a distinguished lawyer and statesman, who appeared in behalf of the league before the House committee having under consideration a bill similar to the one now before the Senate. In opening his remarks on that occasion he stated in general terms of whom the league was composed, as follows:

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appreciate your courtesy and assure you that I will try to keep within the time, although it is possible I may so abbreviate my remarks as not to take the full amount allotted to me. I represent here to-night the organization known as the National League for Medican Freedom. This is a recently formed organization. Its president is B. O. Flower, editor and founder of the Arena and editor of the Twentieth Century Magazine, of Boston. Its vice president is Hon. Charles W. Miller, ex-chairman of the Iowa Democratic State committee. Mr. Chairman, I have stated that this league is a recent organization. It partakes of the nature of a spontaneous movement more, I believe, than any which has appeared in connection with this matter. Let me read just a few telegrams and letters, or extracts from them, received to-day. I shall not attempt to read but three or four. Here is one from Los Angeles, Cal.:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., May 19, 1910.

Hon. CHARLES A. BOOKWALTER,
Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

A medical trust would be a national calamity. In fighting it you are doing humanity a noble service.

Dr. J. A. HOUSER.

Here is a letter from the president of the Ohio Optical Association (reading):

COLUMBUS, OHIO, May 17, 1910.

B. O. FLOWER, Esq.,
Metropolitan Building, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. FLOWER: I read of your work in the Cincinnati Enquirer, and am heart and soul in sympathy with you. The above organization, of which I am president, has just given the A. M. A. a good tussle, and they knew they were in a fight. Also we were victors in the general assembly, and now have a bill awaiting the governor's signature before it becomes a law. The opticians have a national organization composed of various State associations, and we will meet at Cedar Point, August 15 to 18, and I think that in view of the fact that we have been victorious in 24 States, and are still fighting the medical trust in all the others, we might be of mutual aid. I will lend you all the assistance within my power as an individual, for I do not believe any man who has had any experience in combating the selfish and intolerant element that composes the A. M. A. but what will do yeoman service for his fellow man. If I can be of any service to you, I will consider it a favor to be called on as a volunteer. With best wishes for your success, I am,

Your obedient servant,

C. M. MCDONNELL,
21 East State Street, Columbus, Ohio.

I have read these merely to give a general idea of the breadth of this movement and of the alacrity with which the people are sending in their names for the purpose of joining the league.

The purpose of this organization, as stated in its prospectus, is "the maintenance of the rights of the American people against unnecessary, unjust, oppressive, fraternal, and un-American laws, ostensibly related to the subject of health. * * * It seeks through publicity and education to unmask and oppose any legislation which endeavors to put into power any one system of healing and use the Government prestige, money, and machinery to enforce its theories and opinions upon citizens who believe in other forms of healing."

It is as essential to liberty of the individual to have medical freedom as it is to have political or religious freedom. In fact, medical freedom comes possibly closer to his interest, to his material welfare than either of the others. It affects life itself.

This organization, that in a few days has secured 50,000 members and that is confidently expected will have 100,000 members within two weeks, is made up largely of those who have been for years individually interested in defending that freedom for the maintenance of which they have now organized. It is a popular movement. Ten thousand applied for membership yesterday alone. It is the only popular movement here represented.

It has become almost as regular as the sessions of the legislatures themselves for attempts to be made in each State in the Union to pass legislation that will either restrict the practice of medicine to those who have pursued certain courses or that indirectly seek to gain the same object by prohibiting pay for services and similar devices. The people whom I represent believe that every man has a right to select his own physician and to seek remedy and relief wherever he can find it. They know that the attempts to restrict the practice of healing, or of medicine, to certain schools of medicine has been largely the result of the efforts and endeavors of the members of those schools of medicine who would be benefited by such legislation.

Among other States where such attempts have been made, and are being repeatedly made, I will mention New York, Washington, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Nebraska, Colorado, Iowa, Kentucky, Tennessee, Maine, Alabama, Louisiana, Missouri, Michigan, California, Utah, Montana, North Carolina, New Jersey, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Arizona, and Connecticut, and my own State, Massachusetts.

In all these States such efforts have been defeated. In Maryland, Ohio, Virginia, Texas, and Delaware such efforts have been partially successful. It is not surprising that the people who have made the contests against this restrictive legislation for years in these various States look with suspicion upon the efforts of the American Medical Society, to pass the legislation now proposed, particularly in view of the fact that admittedly for 20 years this society has been endeavoring to obtain just such legislation, while during that period through its various members it has been endeavoring to obtain restrictive legislation in the States.

Mr. President, I have some personal knowledge of the efforts that have been made in my own State to bring about just such legislation as this. We have been compelled to meet it at every session of the legislature in our State for years past. It has not stopped at the effort to elevate and make more efficient the medical profession to which no one has ever objected. It has gone further than that and attempted by legislation to exclude everybody else from practicing at all. For a long time it was directed at the Homeopathic School of Medicine, until that school became so strong that it was useless to attempt longer anything of that sort. Then it followed in the case of others and finally came down to the Christian Scientists, and for the past 8 or 10 years the effort of the American Medical Association has been to secure some sort of legislation that would absolutely bar the Christian Scientists from all opportunity to exercise their right of healing disease.

Four years ago, in my own State, a bill having that object was introduced into the legislature. I happened to know the member who introduced it. I telegraphed him my desire to be heard with respect to it before the bill was passed. He examined the bill and let me know that he did not understand the full scope and effect of it, and that he himself would not support it until Christian Scientists were relieved and excepted from its effects.

We have had to keep vigilant watch constantly in my State. I know it is just as true with respect to other States; and back of all this effort to keep everybody else out of the practice of healing disease has been the American Medical Association, not always openly, sometimes they pushed somebody else to the front, but you will always find behind it the force and power of the American Medical Association.

That is just exactly the condition that exists with respect to the bill now before the Senate. You hear a great deal said about the committee of 100 having been before the committees that have investigated this matter, and one would suppose by reading the report of the investigation that it was the committee of 100 that was urging upon the Senate, upon Congress, the enactment of laws of this kind.

But I want to say to the Senators here that behind the committee of 100 is the American Medical Association. Not only so, but practically one-third of the members of the committee of 100 are doctors belonging to the regular school of medicine, and one of them is the man who has been most active in pushing this kind of legislation, Dr. McCormick, who, in a sense, is the walking delegate of the American Medical Association, and who absolutely controls and dominates not only that association, but the committee of 100.

I desire also to read very briefly from a letter of Mr. H. E. Lesan to myself, giving an account of the elements which compose the League for Medical Freedom:

There are now a little over 200,000 members of the National League for Medical Freedom, and I should say that from one-third to one-half of them are Christian Scientists.

I should say, however, that 25 per cent more were sympathizers with the right of the Christian Scientists to practice, even if they were not adherents, so that I should say that 60 to 75 per cent of the membership of the league was secured from the Christian Science influence.

There are 10,000 physicians of all schools, being probably more osteopaths than any others; next to that eclectics, then homeopaths, and then chiropractics, with a very good sprinkling of allopathic physicians, who belong to the league as a protest against the political methods of the American Medical Association.

The greater number of Christian Scientists in the League for Medical Freedom calls for explanation. The Christian Scientists as a body have taken no part whatever in this movement. They are not represented as a body in the League for Medical Freedom. Every Christian Scientist who becomes a member of the league becomes such individually and upon his own volition. No effort has ever been made to induce or coerce any Christian Scientist to take any part in a movement of this kind, and the reason why there are a greater number of them is simply this: The individuals are acting, so far as the Christian Scientists are concerned, but in the case of medical schools that are interested in this matter, they are represented not by individuals; thousands of those who believe in those schools of medicine are represented by the physicians who belong to certain organizations, and while the Christian Scientists appear for that reason to be stronger, they are not so in fact, because the physicians and the heads of these medical organizations are in fact representing thousands and thousands of people who are standing out against this sort of legislation, but whose names do not appear as members.

There is another thing that I should say in this connection, as I am speaking from the standpoint of the Christian Scientist, in justice to the members of the different medical organizations who are acting with us in this matter. It does not follow by any means because members, for example, of the homeopathic school of medicine are uniting with the Christian Scientists in opposing this bill that they are in sympathy with or believe in Christian Science—not by any means.

Just so with all of the other medical professions. It does not follow that because they are making common cause in a fight of this kind that each one of them believes in the method of healing that is resorted to by the other, and therefore I think it is only just for me to say that because members of the medical profession are joining with us in this effort to prevent this sort of legislation it is not because of any sympathies they have for the Christian Scientists as such, but because they themselves are interested in preventing the passage of the bill.

I want to say to Senators here that this movement in opposition to this bill is not confined to members of any profession or any school of medicine or healing. There are thousands of independent American citizens in this country who object to such legislation, without respect to the effect it is going to have upon their interests or upon their schools of medicine. They object to it because it is unjust and un-American.

I have here a letter from Mr. B. O. Flower, the president of the League for Medical Freedom. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in reading it. It explains of what the league is composed. But I ask leave to print it as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., July 1, 1911.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have just returned from two days spent at our New York office. Much of the time while there was spent in getting into shape the data to be sent to you. I requested our people to get a complete list of the executive officers of the league—a list that would include not only the officers and advisory board of the national league, but also the executive officers of the State branches. This amounts to about 500 names in all; and I requested them to indicate the strong men and their position. For example, the chairman of the Virginia League, Dr. Crutcher tells me, is probably the most prominent homeopathic physician in Virginia, a man of influence in Richmond, and of great ability.

The chairman of our league in Florida is probably the most prominent homeopathic physician in that State. As you know, the officers of the San Francisco league are men prominent in public life. In our Massachusetts league Dr. Maurice Worcester Turner was last year president of the International Hahnemann Society. He was for several years instructor in the Boston University School of Medicine, and is one of the prominent homeopathic physicians of the land. The secretary of our league is the proprietor of one of the large and beautiful family hotels of Cambridge, and a man who has been on the governor's council in the past, and is quite prominent in Republican politics of the State as well as a prominent business man. The treasurer and assistant treasurer are men of prominence, one a retired capitalist and the other a banker. Dr. William Leonard, who writes in the June number of the magazine against restrictive medical legislation, is a member of our advisory board, and has worked for us from the first. He was for 19 years professor of materia medica in the University of Minnesota, and is one of the prominent homeopathic physicians of the country. Dr. A. F. Stephens, of St. Louis, another member of our advisory board, is one of the most prominent medical authors, educators, and physicians in the eclectic school. I sent you a few days ago Dr. Munk's strong indorsement of the league's work as president of the National Eclectic Association. I mention these physicians for the reason that a persistent attempt has been made by Senator OWEN and the advocates of State medicine to convey the idea that the homeopathic and eclectic schools of medicine are not in sympathy with our fight, and a persistent attempt has been made to alienate the physicians of these schools from us, and inasmuch as Collier's and Senator OWEN, through reading Collier's article and thus indorsing it, have tried to convey the impression that the management of the league is discreditable, it seemed to me that if 25 or 35 very prominent business, professional, literary, and educational names should be mentioned as officials of the league and as representative of those constituting the executive branch of the league and its State branches, it would most effectively silence this attempt to discredit the league.

After one year's search Collier's have not been able to find 10 persons connected with the league against whom they dared to make charges, and even in these instances a large number of the statements made were deliberate misrepresentations, and other statements were made for the purpose of trying to convey a false impression to the public mind.

Cordially, yours,

B. O. FLOWER.

WHO IS SUPPORTING THE BILL.

Mr. WORKS. Now, after having discussed thus briefly and imperfectly the opposition to the bill, I desire to say something about who it is that is undertaking to bring about the enactment of this bill.

In the first place, I desire to read very briefly from a report of J. N. McCormack, M. D., chairman of the committee on organization of the American Medical Association.

Senators will bear in mind that the impression has gone forth that this legislation is being pressed by the committee of 100, composed of people who are entirely disinterested, and my desire is to show, as I said a while ago, that while that appears to be so, as a matter of fact it is being pressed by the American Medical Association practically and alone. Dr. McCormack says:

Accounts of my itineraries in New England and the Northwest were given such publicity in American Medical Association and State journals at the time that I shall confine this report to the subject of national health legislation, which was put so prominently before the profession by the action of this House two years ago and has been kept constantly before it by the indefatigable labors of your legislative committee since in an effort to secure a national department of health, the aspiration and hope of this association for half a century.

* * * * * * *

Sent on to Washington by your legislative committee, after the great speech of Senator OWEN had impressed this country, as Gladstone had done England a few decades before, "that care for the public health is the first and highest duty of the statesman," I found many leading men of both Houses outspoken in support of the principles of his bill, and a number of our most experienced friends believed that there was an excellent chance to perfect and pass it at the present session of the Congress. After looking over the ground and conferring with Drs. Sower, Wiley, Kober, Woodward, Owen, and others—and I have never seen men more devoted and earnest in a cause—the hearings were arranged, and it is believed that few measures of such a nature were ever more ably supported.

I am inclined to agree with that, Mr. President. I do not think there has ever been a measure before the Congress of the United States which has been more earnestly supported by any body of people than this legislation has been supported by the American Medical Association.

More important was an opposition due to a conflict of interest between the bureaus and divisions directly affected by the proposed transfer to the new health department, about which there might well be honest difference of opinion. This occasioned much anxiety to the friends of the legislation, and the ablest men in the profession came on to Washington and took part in the negotiations to meet the difficulty. These negotiations were continued here, and I am happy to inform you that, under the sagacious leadership of Drs. Welch and Gorgas, great enough to give proper consideration to every interest, an agreement has been reached.

Dr. Welch was at that time, as I remember it, president of the American Medical Association; if not, he was so later, and I believe he has just retired from that position at an election which has been held at the city of Los Angeles, my home.

It will be seen that there was a conflict between the authors of the American Medical Association and the constituted medical authorities of the Government then existing, including the Public Health and National Quarantine Service. It is perfectly evident that some sort of a bargain was made between the representatives of the Government in that bureau and the American Medical Association which was entirely satisfactory to the association.

We are to have a health department commensurate with the powers and resources of our Government, and in time our country is to be put in the front rank in the field of preventive medicine. In accordance with that agreement and by authority I now offer the following—

I think Senators would like very much to know what sort of an agreement that was. I know I would, and I think the people of this country have a right to know what sort of a bargain was made by the medical bureau of this Government and the American Medical Association which brought about this compromise. Here is the resolution that was offered by Dr. McCormack—

Resolved, That the president be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a committee of seven members, which shall be charged with the duty of framing a bill for a national department of health, to be presented to the next session of Congress in December, and that this committee shall consider and determine all matters and policies relating to national health legislation, and may invite the cooperation and cooperate with other organizations having the same purpose in view.

So we see that at that particular time the American Medical Association was quite active in bringing about this legislation. Nothing was heard at that time about the committee of 100 that was supposed to be acting disinterestedly.

I desire also to read briefly from a letter of the president of the committee of 100 to show what sort of action was being taken by the committee, engineered, as I believe and as I assert here, by the American Medical Association, with Dr. McCormack at its head. They have been complaining of the League for Medical Freedom that it had been expending large sums of money in sending telegrams to Members of Congress and in various other ways. This letter shows that the committee of 100 has not been free from that same weakness.

Prof. Irving Fisher, a very distinguished and estimable gentleman, against whom I have nothing whatever to say, acting, I have not the slightest doubt, with perfect sincerity in this matter, in the belief that he was doing something of benefit to the American people, said in this letter:

Our legislative subcommittee and executive subcommittee have held frequent meetings. We believe that it is not possible to overcome the opposition unless a campaign fund of from $20,000 to $25,000 can be raised at once. This will be used for printing, stationery, telegrams, etc., the effect of which will be that Congressmen, especially pivotal Congressmen, will not dare to displease their constituents by opposing President Taft's program. It will also be used to reach our American Health League—which contains many thousand health enthusiasts—to start up our Authors' League of 1,000 health writers, to stimulate our press council of 100 leading editors, and to supply them and the members generally with ammunition in the way of literature; also to reach the labor organizations and the Grange and all our allies. * * *

I am writing to you among the first, knowing that you keenly appreciate the importance of overcoming the selfish opposition to a project which, once started, will surely expand within a decade so that millions upon millions of Government money will be put into this most needed form of national defense.

There is no selfishness about that, I presume. Nobody is to be benefited by the expenditure of these millions and millions of dollars that were to be expended by the department that is proposed to be organized.

Letters received from Congressmen in response to our effort to poll them on this question show that many of them, and especially those who control procedure, need something more than the President's message to urge them to action; in short, that they must have letters and telegrams from their constituents.

In order to show something about the estimation in which the American Medical Association is held in so far as it is attempting to control legislation of this kind, I want to read an extract from the testimony of Henry R. Strong, which was given before the House committee on this subject; and right in this connection I want to make a distinction in the criticism that I make against the American Medical Association between what I regard as its legitimate business, the building up of the efficiency of its own body, the effort that it is making to bring about better conditions in its own profession, and its attempt at legislation of this kind that shall give it an undue advantage over others who are undertaking to do the same kind of work. I have no criticism to make of the American Medical Association so long as it is following out the purposes and objects I have indicated.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. If it would not interrupt the Senator from California, I should like to call his attention to section 3 of the proposed bill, which expressly forbids discrimination in favor of or against any school or system of medicine.

Mr. WORKS. I am coming to that, if the Senator will allow me, and when I reach that point I shall be glad to submit to any question which the Senator may desire to ask. At this time it would be inappropriate.

Mr. OWEN. Very well; I will wait.

Mr. WORKS. I will then be glad to submit to any suggestion which the Senator has to make in that connection. The statement of Mr. Strong is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Henry R. Strong. Ten minutes have been allotted to you, Mr. Strong.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, with all due respect to those who have appeared before this committee, I desire to say that I am in sympathy with neither the homeopaths, the eclectics, the osteopaths, the Christian Scientists, nor any nor either of the so-called sects, if I may so call them, that I suppose are behind this league. My sympathies, as are my interests, are with and bound up with the so-called school of regular physicians, but I believe that if this bill is passed it will accomplish a state establishment of medicine in this country, and I believe such was the purpose of those with whom this movement originated some six or eight years ago.

I refer, Mr. Chairman, to a clique of political doctors who have captured the control of the organization of the American Medical Association, who are falsely pretending to represent the regular physicians of this country. The fact of the matter is that the American Medical Association itself does not have 80,000 members, as the gentlemen who have addressed you stated it had. It has only 30,000 or 40,000, although by coercive methods the membership is rapidly growing. Therefore, as I say, the clique in control of the association does not fairly represent the association, nor does the association represent the profession as a whole.

HOW THE EFFORTS OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION TO SECURE LEGISLATION IS VIEWED BY OTHERS.

Mr. President, in order to bring to the attention of Senators the position that is taken by others besides Christian Scientists with respect to this matter, I desire to call attention to resolutions which were adopted by the Eclectic Medical Society of the State of California, at Redlands, Cal., on June 2, 1911:

ECLECTIC MEDICAL SOCIETY OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Redlands, Cal., June 2, 1911.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was unanimously passed at the meeting of the California State Eclectic Medical Society, held in San Francisco, May 23 to 25:

Whereas there has been introduced at the present extra session of Congress the so-called Owen bill, which is designed to eventually establish a State medicine; and

Whereas a State medicine is, equally with a State religion, contrary to a republican form of government and obnoxious to its people: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Eclectic Medical Society of the State of California, in its thirty-eighth annual session, and representing 300 registered physicians, is unalterably opposed to Federal or State compulsory medical laws unless such acts preserve the absolute independence of the physician and citizen to use and employ the system of treatment most consistent with their choice or belief, in the same manner as the rights and privileges of all citizens are now guaranteed with respect to politics and religion.

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to mail a copy of this resolution to President Taft and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress; also to Gov. Johnson and to each of the senators and assemblymen of the State of California.

O. C. WELBOURN.
ALBERT J. ATKINS.
GEO. G. GERE.
ORAN NEWTON.
L. A. PERCE.
E. R. HARVEY.

As indicating what the feeling of outside people, if I may so call them, is with respect to this sort of legislation which is going on in the States as well as in Congress, I desire now to read an editorial which appeared in the Los Angeles Express only a short time ago bearing upon legislation that was attempted to be passed in the Legislature of California at the session of the legislature just closed.

DOCTORS, TAKE WARNING.

Los Angeles is opposed to the system of medical tyranny over the public schools designed to be established by senate bill No. 733 and assembly bill No. 964. The fathers and mothers of this city will not deliver their children over to the Doctors' Trust those measures would create. If the price of education at the public schools is to be the surrender of all attending scholars to the arbitrary authority of State physicians who will prescribe in bigoted obedience to the requirements of a would-be medical monopoly, Los Angeles will not pay that price.

As the parents of southern California would resist to the uttermost the introduction into the schools of a group of sectarians who should exercise exclusive control over the religious teaching of their children, so will they resist the proposed surrender of their children to a Medical Trust. As the public schools, attended by children of all religious creeds, must be kept free from the dominating influence of any single creed, so must they be kept free from the dominating influence of any single school of medicine.

We are of the race that during these centuries has won liberty of conscience and freedom of belief. As no State would now dare direct how the children in its schools should worship God, so should no State dare attempt to compel such children to submission to the tenets of some particular school of medicine. If, in opposition to the beliefs and convictions of parents, their children are to be treated and prescribed for by State practitioners exercising arbitrary authority in aid of the establishment of a medical monopoly, it will not be long before State clergymen, representing some State creed, will be given exclusive control over their religious beliefs.

Let the legislature make no mistake in its judgment of public sentiment as to this proposal. All else that it has done, important as its work has been, sinks into insignificance beside this act that is proposed. If the legislature aids the Doctors' Trust to this attempted seizure of the public schools it will become infamous. If it attempts to compel the boys and girls of California to submit themselves to the arbitrary control of monopolistic medical arrogance it will become odious and hateful. No legislation of this character should receive an instant's consideration. It were suitable to the period in which men were burned at the stake because they chose to worship God in accordance with their consciences, but it has no place in this century of freedom and enlightenment.

The Express attacks no school of medicine, but no school of medicine shall attack the liberties of the people. California is free from medical tyranny. Let it remain so. It has no State religion. Let it not establish a State system of medicine. Should physicians of any school be given power to examine and prescribe for children because they are scholars, presently they would be given authority to examine and prescribe for men and women because they are citizens. The schools now are free and they must be kept free. Neither sectarianism nor medical slavery shall be allowed to overwhelm and destroy them.

I also desire to include in my remarks a short editorial from the Los Angeles Herald, entitled "Menaced by a Doctors' Trust." It is as follows:

MENACED BY A DOCTOR TRUST.

The attempt by the Mann bill to turn over the public health affairs of the Government to a Doctors' Trust is a most pernicious attempt to legislate in favor of one school of medicine and to lay every home open to offensive regulations by Government inspectors. The proposed bill would change the name of the existing Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and delegate to the new body powers that are in violation of the rights of citizenship. All that an inspector would have to do in order to interfere in a case of illness in any home would be to decide in his own mind that the disease might interfere with interstate commerce. Then he is clothed with almost absolute power to take charge of the case, establish rules and regulations, and call in whatever physician he desired, despite family protests.

Back of this bill there is a school of physicians that thus expects to be recognized officially and thus be empowered to force upon the public its own theories for the causes of diseases and its own methods for cures to the exclusion of all other schools and their remedies and plans of treatment.

Under the action of the Mann bill a man's home would cease to be his castle, and he would be at the mercy of an inspector who would have a defense for any act he might commit on the ground that he feared the disease might become a public menace.

There was also at its annual meeting, May 16 and 17, 1911, a resolution on this subject passed by the Indiana Institute of Homeopathy. It is as follows:

Resolutions passed by the Indiana Institute of Homeopathy at its forty-fifth annual session held in Indianapolis, Ind., May 16–17, 1911.

Whereas the National League for Medical Freedom is an organization whose purpose is to serve and perpetuate the personal liberty of the people of the United States as pertains to the choice of medical attendants; and

Whereas this liberty has been and is still threatened by reason of an effort by the American Medical Association to have enacted a bill creating a national health board, with power and authority to interfere with the rights and powers of the individual States to control their internal affairs: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Indiana Institute of Homeopathy, That we hereby indorse the purpose of the National League for Medical Freedom, and we do hereby most earnestly protest against the creation of a national health board with power and authority superior to that invested in the health boards of the individual States; and be it further

Resolved, That we extend our mutual support to Dr. Louis Crutcher as the homeopathic representative on the directorate of the National League for Medical Freedom, and commend his work to all lovers of personal liberty.

I should say in this connection that at one time the National Grange was induced to indorse legislation of this kind, but it evidently found that it had made a mistake, and subsequent to that time the resolutions I am about to read were adopted by the grange:

PUBLIC HEALTH BUREAU.

That there be no ambiguity or misunderstanding to our action and meaning of our position on public health bureau, we add:

"Whereas the resolutions adopted at the forty-third annual session of the National Grange, favoring the consolidation of the various Federal health bureaus, have been used by the committee of 100 on national health as an indorsement of the proposal to create a new Federal department to be called the department of public health; and

"Whereas the attitude of the National Grange in this matter has been misrepresented by the advocates of a public health department; and

"Whereas the creation of such a department would involve the appointment of thousands of unnecessary officeholders and the expenditure of millions of dollars, which could be better devoted to establishing parcels post, aiding the States in their work of road improvement, and other reforms in which the Grange is interested: Therefore

"Resolved, That the National Grange has not and does not indorse a department of public health, and sees no good reason why the farmers of the country should favor the creation of such a department, or any legislation that might be construed as a step in that direction."

The above resolution was passed by the National Grange at its forty-fourth annual session at Atlantic City in 1910.

C. M. FREEMAN,
Secretary National Grange.

I desire also to read briefly from a letter of C. W. Miller, addressed to myself, in which he says:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 30, 1911.

For the past 11 years Dr. McCormack has been the walking delegate of the Doctors' Trust, traveling from State to State for the purpose of gathering the physicians of every county visited into the organization. His afternoon stunt in each place he visits is to preach "medical economics" (how to get more money) to the physicians, and in the evening address a public gathering on the great need of a health department and the near-divine attributes of the profession that is seeking to lay upon the altar of the public weal the prospects of its own business.

The fee schedule promulgated by Dr. McCormack first appeared in the Journal of the Medical Association on November 28, 1908, afterwards being reprinted in various State medical journals, and it very accurately indicated what the character of his 11 years' work among physicians has been.

Further evidence in this regard and of the flattering results of his work may be found in the report of his stewardship, which he, as chairman of the committee on organization, made to the annual meeting of the American Medical Association in Chicago on June 2–5, 1908. Therein he says:

"For eight years I have been almost a stranger in my home and family that I might serve you. My constant regret has been that my capacity for service has not been greater.

"As a business proposition, on a very conservative estimate, I am convinced that my work has added indirectly hundreds of thousands of dollars to your revenues, but this is the smallest part of it, as will one day be known. At least two carefully selected men should be put in the field, and others should be added from year to year until the benefactions of this work are felt not only by every doctor but at every hearthstone in this great country—that is, until the profession is really organized."

Respectfully submitted.

C. W. MILLER.

Mr. President, I also submit the following address by Dr. Munk at the meeting of the National Eclectic Association in June, 1911:

We, as eclectics, are a separate and independent school of medicine, but we are not the only one. It is as necessary and beneficial to have a variety of schools of medicine as it is to have parties in politics or sects in religion. Each school, party, or sect permits the citizen to have a choice, to select what he wants, and gives him the opportunity to act with those of his own way of thinking. This is his constitutional right under our system of free government of which we are all so proud. Attempts have been made to invade and annul this inalienable right. The same spirit of monopoly which pervades the commercial world is also found in medicine. To establish one school of medicine to the exclusion of all others would create State medicine, which is just as obnoxious and dangerous as is State religion. A variety of schools, parties, or sects is an advantage, as it causes a friendly rivalry by each one striving to excel the other, and a healthy competition that benefits the majority, which is as it should be, especially in a Government like ours, where majorities rule. This coveted power has been sought after for many years by the political ring in the American Medical Association, which it hopes to obtain eventually through State and national legislation.

All of the minor schools of medicine, known as the Allies, are opposed to such action, on the ground that it is class legislation and unconstitutional; but neither one of the Allies is strong enough to engage the enemy single handed. It also does not seem to be convenient for them to unite their several interests in one counter organization. In this crisis a new and welcome friend has appeared upon the scene to lend a helping hand. The National League for Medical Freedom was organized one short year ago as a lay movement in opposition to the offensive activity of the American Medical Association to force the Owen bill through Congress and establish a public bureau of health. Owing to the league's timely and energetic protest the bill failed to pass, but it is up again in a modified, but no less objectionable form, to be acted on during the present extra session of Congress. That the bill will be again defeated goes without saying, now that the people have been warned of their danger. If such a bill ever becomes law it will be a serious menace to liberty and freedom in the United States and will be the entering wedge for other objectionable and harmful legislation of a like character.

The scope of the league is nation wide and has branch offices in nearly every large city of the Union. Its function is to expose and oppose the evil designs of the Medical Trust in its endeavors to fasten itself upon the States and Nation; to give publicity to every point of interest and teach the people the right and wrong of everything that pertains to the subject. It is pledged to oppose every attempt to legislate against the interests of the people or to rob the citizen of his liberty and right to choose his own medical advisor. The objects of the league meet exactly our wants, and it behooves us to "pool our issues" and "hitch our wagon to a star" that will carry us safely and surely on to victory.

J. A. MUNK.

Also, resolutions passed at the thirty-second meeting of the International Hahnemann Association, at Asbury Park, N. J., June 23, 1911, as follows:

Whereas there is a persistent effort upon the part of the American Medical Association to establish a national department of health and thereby to infringe upon the liberties of the people in the free choice of a medical adviser and of the school of medicine by which they shall be treated; and

Whereas there now exist several schools of medical practice, well patronized by the people of the United States, none of which is to be recognized by the projected department of health; and

Whereas several of the large insurance companies have taken upon themselves to give medical advice to their policy holders and thus to further the policy of state medicine and the selfish and unpatriotic aims of the dominant school of medicine: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the International Hahnemann Association in session assembled does hereby utterly condemn and protest against the passage of Senate bill No. 1, known as the Owen bill, and House bill No. 11035, known as the Dyer bill, and all bills of similar import; and be it further

Resolved, That the International Hahnemann Association resents the impudent meddling on the part of commercial insurance companies with the medical treatment of private individuals and the practice of the family physician.

HOW THE POWER OF THE DOCTORS IS EXERCISED.

I come now to a very brief consideration of the manner in which the power that is obtained by the American Medical Association by means of legislation of this kind in the States is exercised and the way in which it is received by the people who are cognizant of its exercise by that authority. I call attention first to a very brief article appearing in the Chicago (Ill.) Journal, as follows:

VACCINATION IS ENFORCED—PITTSBURG CHILDREN MUST SHOW MARKS OR SUBMIT TO INOCULATION IN PITTSBURG CAMPAIGN.

PITTSBURG, January 12.

The bureau of health of Pittsburg has ordered the immediate vaccination of all school children who can not prove by ocular demonstration that they have been vaccinated. Health Supt. E. L. Walter has discovered that many of the vaccination certificates furnished by pupils have been "faked," and he has instructed his assistants to accept neither assertion nor certificates unless vaccination marks can be shown. At least 200 children are now being vaccinated daily, and the doctors, working in squads of six, are going through each school from cellar to garret.

I also read very briefly from an article in the New York Press of March 28:

NEWARK, March 27.

There were further protests to-day by physicians and citizens against the order of Dr. George J. Holmes, chief medical inspector of the board of health, directing his assistants in examining school pupils to make all the children undress to the waist. The first protests came from parents who refused to let their children be subjected to such examination. Particular objection was made to the method in which the examinations have been conducted. Girls from 10 to 14 years old have been taken in groups from classrooms and compelled to remove their clothing in one another's presence. This has met with opposition from many of the pupils.

I also submit a communication in the Milwaukee Free Press, as follows:

LETTERS TO THE FREE PRESS—PROTESTS AGAINST SCHOOL-INSPECTION BILL.

MILWAUKEE, April 29.

To the Editor:

On April 14 the assembly voted indefinitely to postpone action on the so-called school-inspection (doctor's) bill. This was the result of the vigorous protest set up by members of our league, who gave the joint committee of the senate and assembly facts that could end the matter in no other way.

This class of legislation (the most paternalistic) was supposed to be dead; but now I am informed that representatives of the American Medical Association and a local medical society branch have drawn another bill and sent it to the doctors who are members of the legislature.

This bill is also a compulsion measure, although it is written in a way intended to pull the wool over the eyes of the opponents of this kind of law.

When the bill is up for hearing or a vote every county in Wisconsin will be heard from against it.

Any bill, no matter what the wording, which adds to the authority of the so-called Medical Trust over the liberties of the people of Wisconsin will meet with vigorous opposition of this league, which is organized in every county of the State.

As long as doctors are in politics, just so long will this league exist. The doctors' organization has a membership of 82,000. The league's strength is 200,000, a large share of which is contributing funds to pay the campaign expenses. Thus you have the two forces—the first named old and seasoned and with professional interest involved, while the latter is but a year old, with personal and to some extent religious liberty behind it.

The political doctors sometimes argue that their intentions are purely philanthropic. Let us look at Chicago. In 1908 the Cook County Medical Society offered, and the city accepted, a plan for the inspection—almost free—of public-school children. The Chicago newspapers fell into the trap and boosted it along. A few days after the first inspection was only partly made, these newspapers spread the result all over their first pages, announcing that "60,000 school children require medical attendance." Nearly all of these boys and girls were sent home, often to distracted parents, with letters detailing the awful diseases that the youngsters had. You can guess how many of the 60,000 were hurried to a doctor's office! Some were operated upon for adenoids, at all the way from $10 to $75 per operation; others were fitted with spectacles, and others were given prescriptions.

Is there any doubt about the sordid high finance end of this thing? Or in sounding these frequent alarms about disease are the alarmists "zealously working," as Henry M. Hyde says in the Saturday Evening Post, "to the destruction of the prospects of their own business"?

In the Chicago case it looks as if the "political doctors" sounded an alarm that resulted in a shower of prescriptions, medical calls, operations—business.

Medical practice, generally speaking (excepting always a great many physicians who are in a high, proud class by themselves), is firmly established by the American Medical Association on a commercial basis with a department devoted to alarms with which the magazines and newspapers are being victimized because most of the editors are not giving the subject the thought it deserves, and are publishing the alarms and creating the business for the political doctors, who of all men have and express the greatest aversion for the press—this latter being a part of the ethics of so-called "regular" practice—except in times when an "alarm" is necessary, and then it must be sounded by the press "free gratis for nothing." To advertise is one of the wickedest and most unforgivable things a "regular" (allopath) can do, but there is no rule in any medical association that I know of which prevents a member from sending a "personal" to a city editor announcing that he—the doctor—is going out of town on a vacation, so his patients will understand that he hasn't quit business.

Every good citizen has the welfare of the school children at heart, and the interest shown by the political doctors is all right until we dig around and find out what is back of it.

NATIONAL LEAGUE FOR MEDICAL FREEDOM.
WILLIAM F. HOOKER,
Secretary Wisconsin Division.

WHAT THE DOCTORS SAY ABOUT IT.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to some of the things that have been said by doctors themselves with respect to this matter, not only in regard to the character of the efforts that are being made, but what they expect to accomplish by the efforts that they are making to secure the passage of this bill.

One of the prominent members of the American Medical Association, Prof. G. Frank Lydston, M. D., of the faculty of the medical department of the University of Illinois, in an address before the Ohio Valley Medical Association, November 10, 1909, said:

Under the present political régime the American Medical Association has developed into a medicopolitical and commercial trust, which is the direct antithesis of what the machine which runs it promised it should be.

Dr. Welch, president of the American Medical Association, said to Senator SMOOT:

I would simply like to throw out the suggestion that it may be that the Federal Government can exercise larger powers in this matter than is generally supposed to be the case.

Dr. Henry O. Marcy, former president of the American Medical Association, in an interview in the Boston Traveler on May 16, said of the opposition to the Owen bill:

It is the old cry of the incompetents who practice under various designations against legislation that will tend to bar them from practice and keep the practice in the hands of those who will not be a menace to the public health.

There is the secret, Mr. President, of the effort that is being made in this direction. It is to bar those who are not supposed to have the necessary qualifications from the point of view of the American Medical Association from practicing the art of healing in any way whatever.

Dr. C. A. L. Reed, chairman of the legislative committee of the American Medical Association, says:

The principle that is involved is the same—that the man in possession of the technical knowledge which gives him a scientific comprehension of his subject and his problem * * * should have the executive authority to enforce that knowledge and not be overridden by a man who has no such technical knowledge, and consequently no such comprehension of the importance of the subject.

Now, see what it leads to, Mr. President. Who is going to determine who has the technical knowledge to deal with these questions if not the head of the department that is expected to be provided under this bill? Whatever his decree may be with respect to it, that will determine the qualifications of anybody connected with the administration of the public health. There is no way whatever provided for in this bill, or in any other way that I am aware of, that his judgment in that matter could be controlled in any way.

Prof. J. Pease Norton, of Yale University, in a speech before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, reprinted with approval in the Journal of the American Medical Association, said:

1. It seems desirable that a United States national department of health should be established, having as its head a secretary who shall be a member of the Executive Cabinet.
2. The purpose of the department should be to take all measures calculated, in the judgment of experts, to decrease deaths, to decrease sickness, and to increase physical and mental efficiency of citizens.
3. It should consist of the following bureaus:
National bureau of infant hygiene.
National bureau of education and schools.
National bureau of sanitation.
National bureau of pure food.
National bureau of registration of physicians and surgeons.
National bureau of registration of drugs, druggists, and drug manufacturers.
National bureau of registration of institutions of public and private relief, correction, detention, and residence.
National bureau of organic diseases.
National bureau of quarantine.
National bureau of health information.
National bureau of immigration.
National bureau of labor conditions.
National bureau of research, requiring statistics.
National bureau of research, requiring laboratories and equipment.

That simply shows the extent to which they propose to go if they succeed in establishing a department of health, and to my mind is quite significant.

THE FALSITY OF THE ARTICLES IN COLLIER'S WEEKLY.

Mr. President, I come now to the question of the truth or falsity of the articles contained in Collier's Weekly. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in reviewing those articles. I have here certain very brief affidavits and also correspondence between the editor of Collier's Weekly and the officers of the League for Medical Freedom which will explain themselves and I think will clearly show that the articles contained in Collier's were not only false, but that they were knowingly so, and that they were malicious in their character.

They are as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of New York, ss:

Benjamin O. Flower, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is of lawful age and a resident of Boston, Suffolk County, Mass.; that he is the editor of the Twentieth Century Magazine, in said city of Boston, and is the president of the National League for Medical Freedom, the principal offices of which and headquarters are in New York City: that he is acquainted with the officers and directors of said league, and that their occupations are as follows:

That William R. Brown, the first vice president, of Indianapolis, Ind., is a director of the Brown-Ketcham Iron Works, of said city, and is also president of the Willett Press, of New York City.

Hon. Charles W. Miller, of Waverly, Iowa, who is the second vice president of said league, is the publisher of the Waverly Democrat, in said city of Waverly, and a member of the Legislature of the State of Iowa.

That Paul A. Harsch, of said league, is the president of the Clinton Close Co. and secretary of the E. H. Close Realty Co., both of Toledo, Ohio.

That the Astor Trust Co., treasurer of said league, is a well-known financial institution of New York City.

That Hon. John L. Bates, the general counsel for said league, was formerly governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and is now an attorney in active practice in Boston.

That Col. Frederick A. Bangs, the associate counsel of said league, is an attorney in active practice in the city of Chicago, Ill., with offices in the First National Bank Building.

That the directors of said league are nine in number, and are as follows: Benjamin O. Flower, Frederick A. Bangs, William R. Brown, Harry E. Lesan, Charles W. Miller, Diana Belais, Harry Linden Chiles, Howard P. Crutcher, and Paul A. Harsch.

That of said directors not hereinabove mentioned as officers, said Lesan is the head of the H. E. Lesan Advertising Agency, of the city of New York, which said agency, among other things, handles the advertising of the New York Central lines and the United States Motor Co.

That Mrs. Diana Belais is the President of the Antivivisection Society of New York.

That Harry L. Chiles, of Orange, N. J., is an osteopathic physician in good and regular standing and active practice in said city, and he is also the secretary of the American Osteopathic Association.

That Dr. Howard P. Crutcher, of Kansas City, Mo., is a homeopathic physician in good and regular standing and in active practice in the city of Kansas City, and is registrar of the Hahnemannian Medical Institute.

Affiant further states that the affairs and business of said National League for Medical Freedom are conducted and transacted by said officers and directors and their employees, and by none other.

Affiant further states that the membership of said league is upward of 135,000; that it is manifestly impossible for affiant to be cognizant of the business activities of so large a number, but that to the best of his knowledge and belief none of said members are manufacturers of fraudulent remedies, or of any remedies.

And affiant further declares no manufacturers of fraudulent remedies or other remedies have been solicited or requested to become members of said league or to contribute to its support by any of the officers thereof.

Affiant further states that but one contribution to the funds of said league has been received from a person known to be the manufacturer of a remedy, and that said contribution was declined with thanks and returned to the donor.

And further deponent saith not.

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of New York, ss.

Paul Arthur Harsch, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the secretary of the National League for Medical Freedom: is in charge of its office and has the general conduct of its business: that he receives all remittances and contributions to the funds of said league, keeps proper books of account, and makes all deposits of receipts with the treasurer.

That, to the best of his knowledge and belief, none of the contributions to the funds of said league are from manufacturers of fraudulent remedies or of any remedies.

That no such manufacturers have ever been solicited to become members of said league or to contribute to its support by any of the officers thereof, and that the only contribution received from such a manufacturer was of the sum of $100, and was by this affiant returned to the donor with the thanks of the league.

Affiant further states that he has read the above and foregoing affidavit, signed by Benjamin O. Flower, that he is familiar with the facts therein set forth, and that the same are substantially true.

And further deponent saith not.

That he knows the source of all subscriptions and incomes of this league, and declares upon his oath that no subscription or fund of any kind or character has been solicited or received by this league or by him from any individual, firm, or corporation in any manner engaged in the manufacture or sale of medicines or drugs, or from any association composed of individuals, firms, or corporations engaged in the making or selling of drugs or medicines.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, June 28, 1911.

Mr. ALBERT LEE,
Managing Editor of Collier's, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. LEE: Your office kindly sends me an Extracts Bulletin of June 3, for what reason I know not, unless you desire me to take some notice of the leading article. Because of the article's reference to previous squibs, I have also looked them up.

It seems to me that I have rarely read articles which more clearly ignored fundamentals and indulged in mere bickerings and small animosities than these. The animus of the writer is plain in his first sentence: "The League of Medical Freedom is a bunch we don't like." Then he proceeds to dislike them, and that is about all.

You attack B. O. Flower, but chiefly through R. C. Flower. B. O. Flower may have been president of a patent-medicine company, or he may not. I don't know. But B. O. Flower has a career as a public-spirited editor, fearless editor, and advanced publicist too long for Norman Hapgood to discredit or to require me to defend it. He is not one of the late comers in the fight against plutocracy, privilege, and all the corrupting influences which threaten our social and political system as Collier's is. I do not recall the date of your conversion to real democracy, but I know it has never been strong enough to keep you from supporting the tools of plutocracy, and I believe that B. O. Flower was an honored veteran in the fight against the very abuses which you now decry when Collier's was a mere book agent's journal.

Mrs. Belais you call a "well-meaning, ignorant, reckless, and muddle-headed agitator." Well, well, that sounds surprisingly like the descriptions which the "standpat" and pro-Ballinger journals were wont to make of Collier's. Not an argument in it; just a denunciation. You find fault because she is "president of an antiexperiment society" (without naming the society). Probably the lady is a member of some society which objected to the well-authenticated case (for example) of the eminent Philadelphia physicians who indulged in the pleasing experiments of inoculating the eyes of orphan children with tuberculosis, etc., just to see what would happen. Is Collier's a proexperimentalist in a case like that?

Collier's manages to work itself into a spasm of horror over anyone who hints that patent medicines may not be much worse than other medicines. Personally, I don't believe in patent medicines (as the term is generally understood), but is it very much worse to defend a patent medicine than to sneer at a woman who disbelieves in the wanton torture of animals and of defenseless children? Even is it very much worse to believe in a patent medicine which has its formula printed on the label, as some have, than to believe in a physician's prescription, being entirely ignorant of its contents, as most patients are? Is it?

I have no doubt that there are members of the league who are in it for ulterior purposes. That is true of any organization, but that is not the question. The question is, What is the league really trying to do, and doing?

You don't get down to the question at all, except in some ranting assertions. You sneer at Flower as the author of the pamphlet on bubonic plague, but why don't you answer the argument contained in the pamphlet? You talk about a "notorious Colorado quack," but who is the man and why is he a "quack"? You reach the limit of absurdity when you attribute an increase in the Chicago death rate in 1910 over that of 1908 to the "large membership of the league" in Chicago.

Really, Mr. Lee, you and Norm Hapgood and the rest of the bright bunch on Collier's ought not to allow such a fool statement to appear. It reflects so severely upon your known intelligence that one can not discuss it with patience. The league is strong in Cleveland, too, and just at present the death rate is less than 10 per 1,000. Is that due to the league? Not unless one argues as Collier's is arguing, which Heaven forbid!

You accuse the league of "gopher methods." Another sneer which means nothing. Your statements are prejudiced and intended to prejudice others. They are not fair, they are not honest. Collier's has published several editorials against the league and you say you have received many protests. Have you published any of the arguments of the protests? I haven't seen any. Suppose, then, some member of the league should refer to your methods as "pole-cat methods," because you stir up such a stench to becloud the issue. That wouldn't be polite, would it? And I wouldn't make such a reference to a magazine which I like (as a rule) as well as I do Collier's. Nor would I to any other. I am merely showing you how cheap your methods are, and how unpleasant they would be, were one to retaliate in kind. What are the "gopher methods" of the league? As far as I know, they have been singularly open. They have relied upon the "right of petition" and the weight of argument to defeat the establishment of a national board of health (?). When accused of being a "patent-medicine organization," they offered to disclose the list of contributors to their treasury to a properly authorized committee. Have you heard of any such offer by the league's opponents? Yet Collier's goes right on intimating that it is controlled by patent medicine interests.

But why not cease your bickering and get down to fundamentals? If you really think the league is a menace, why not state your real, and vital, objections to it and devote a certain space to the subject, pro and con? There would be something about an attitude like that which one could respect.

What is the fundamental item at issue? The league disbelieves in the establishment of State medicine, under the guise of a department of health, or a bureau of health.

Why does it so disbelieve? For reasons which ought certainly to appeal to Collier's. We have too much departmental rule in our Government now. Didn't you have enough of an experience of the corrupt strength of departmental government in the Ballinger case? You know it was only by a fortunate fluke that Ballinger was prevented from Morganheiming Alaska. Why? Because he was a departmental head and could interpret and execute laws both at the same time. The Post Office Department is another instance. Beneficent as it usually is, the Post Office Department abrogates the Constitution of the United States, and does it with impunity, and there is no appeal to any court which can prevent it. You know this, don't you? Departmental law and departmental justice are apt to be amenable to nothing except public opinion, and most of the time that isn't working, as you know.

Now, suppose you establish a department of medicine (no matter whether you call it a department or health or what), how long do you suppose it would be before the rights of all schools differing from it would be infringed? Just about long enough to get it into working order.

Would the American Medical Association be satisfied to have a department of medicine, or health, and allow a Christian Scientist, say, to be at the head of it? They would not. Neither would you; neither would I.

Would Collier's be satisfied to have a department of health and have B. O. Flower at the head of it? You would not. Neither would the American Medical Association. Why? Why, because you don't want a department of health. You want a department of medicine.

I am in favor of health legislation—when it is health legislation. I am in favor of pure-food laws, and I venture to say I would go further than Collier's in defining what "pure food" really is. For example, I do not consider cold-storage corpses, hog-fat shortened bakery goods, or insect-colored bottled fruits (all of which now exist, unlabeled) as pure foods.

I am in favor of sanitation—public and private—and I do not consider it sanitary to put diseased pus into healthy veins "to prevent disease." Collier's evidently does.

I believe in the preservation of the purity of our water supplies, and I decry the fatuousness of our present medicated sanitarians, who make no objections to the pollution of our water supplies by sewage, but want to purify it afterwards by filtering or chemicalizing.

I believe in health, in hygiene, and in humaneness, and in making medical laws I want all three to be considered.

I believe we should attain to pure-food conditions, sanitation, hygiene, health through separate enactments, so that our rights may be safeguarded in each case. (The initiative and referendum will help the safeguarding.) I do not believe we should deliver ourselves into the hands of a department of medicine as a salvation from our physical ills.

I have nothing against "regular physicians," except when they attempt to arrogate to themselves all medical wisdom and authority. Some of my best friends and my family physician are "regular" doctors. At the same time I reserve the right to consult an osteopath, homeopath, hydropath, or any other "path" or "nonpath." In other words, I believe in that freedom which Collier's decries, and I believe the great majority of the members of the National League for Medical Freedom are of like mind. I do not mean that they all believe as I do, except that they believe in letting the other fellow believe as he does, and they deny the right of a department to destroy that freedom.

Collier's may have better reasons than thus far given, but in this instance I can not but feel it has made a sorry spectacle of itself in its fight against freedom.

Sincerely, yours,

EDMUND VANCE COOKE,
30 Mayfield Road.

MAY 15.

Mr. NORMAN HAPGOOD,
Editor Collier's Weekly, New York City, N. Y.

DEAR MR. HAPGOOD: I received in Pittsburg your letter of May 11 asking for certain information concerning the National League for Medical Freedom, and promptly wired you that the information requested would be furnished as soon as the data could be gotten together, and that on my return to New York I would give you every facility for further investigation.

If you are going into the subject as thoroughly as you say you are—and as thoroughly as I hope you will—let as many as possible of your important questions and our answers be put in writing. Ask all the questions you want—verbally or otherwise—we will answer them frankly; but to avoid misunderstanding and the possibility of being misquoted, let us make written communications the foundation for anything you print.

About the "half dozen men who met at a New York hotel," the editor of the Digest says "they met one day." In reality they met on several different days and at several different times and places.

The persons who attended these conferences—the founders of the National League for Medical Freedom—were those who are its present directors, and are as follows:

Mr. W. R. Brown, of Indianapolis, Ind.; Mr. B. O. Flower, of Boston, Mass.; Mr. Charles W. Miller, of Waverly, Iowa; Dr. Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, of Kansas City, Mo.; Dr. Harry Linden Chiles, of East Orange, N. J.; Mrs. Diana Belais, of New York; Mr. Frederick A. Bangs, of Chicago, Ill.; Mr. Paul A. Harsch, of Toledo, Ohio; and myself.

The affiliations of these people are as follows:

Mr. W. R. Brown is vice president of the Brown-Ketcham Iron Works, of Indianapolis, Ind., and Greensburg, Pa. He is a Christian Scientist.

Mr. B. O. Flower is the editor of the Twentieth Century Magazine, of Boston, Mass. He was the founder of the Arena and was its editor for years. When sick he employs the services of an allopathic physician, but for 20 years has been opposing the efforts of the allopathic profession to establish a medical monopoly. Because of his writings in favor of medical freedom and his excellent reputation for integrity and patriotism the position of temporary president of the league was offered to him by a representative of Mr. W. R. Brown and myself, and he accepted the offer, to be later unanimously elected permanent president. Last week he was unanimously reelected president for his second term.

Mr. Charles W. Miller was invited to attend the New York conferences by Mr. Brown, Mr. Flower, and myself because of his vigorous opposition to medical arrogance in the Iowa Legislature, a subject which will be treated fully by Mr. Miller.

Dr. Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher is one of the most prominent physicians in the homeopathic profession. He is a member of the faculty of the Hahnemann Medical Institute in Kansas City, Mo., and has been for years warning homeopaths in speeches and writings against the aggression of the allopathic monopoly and opposing the trust and political methods of the American Medical Association. He was offered a directorship of the league and accepted it, and has been stanchly supported in the league by thousands of homeopathic practitioners and their patients.

Dr. Harry Linden Chiles is secretary of the National Osteopathic Association. He accepted a directorship, and is also being supported by thousands of osteopathic practitioners and their patients.

Mrs. Diana Belais was offered a directorship because of her courageous efforts to secure a higher law in New York State than the doctors' cruel theories and professional arrogance. She is president of the New York Antivivisection Society.

Mr. Frederick A. Bangs is an ex-president of the Hamilton Club, of Chicago. He is a prominent attorney and a Christian Scientist.

Mr. Paul A. Harsch is secretary of the E. H. Close Realty Co., of Toledo, Ohio, and removed to New York to become secretary of the league. He is a Christian Scientist.

I am a Christian Scientist.

These persons joined the work at different times, but all within a few weeks.

The only person who was acting in any prominent way at first who is not acting now is Joseph R. Kathrens, at present Chicago office manager of the Lesan Advertising Agency. He was a director and secretary-treasurer during the first few weeks while Mr. Harsch was arranging to remove to New York from Toledo. He represented me.

These people have run the league from its inception by meetings, the records of which you are at liberty to see if you desire.

They have collected all moneys received and disbursed by popular subscriptions among their own affiliations and from no place else.

The amount of money collected up to May 2, 1911, was $94,274.39. The subscription books are open to you in detail for any investigation you want to make, and we will also be glad to tell you in detail what the money was spent for.

In the membership of approximately 200,000 at this time there are registered 7,500 individual subscriptions, ranging from 25 cents to $10,000. Many of these sums, however, have been made up from smaller sums secured by the person sending in the larger sum. It is likely, therefore, that fully 20,000 persons have subscribed. Where a large sum has been sent us we can secure the names of the individuals subscribing the aggregate.

In the membership there are nearly 10,000 physicians of all schools, and at this time the membership of the league is growing faster among physicians than among any other class of people.

These members, including physicians, have joined this league and subscribed their money from one motive and one motive only; i. e., to stop the dominant efforts of the allopathic medical oligarchy to establish a system of State compulsory medicine in this country and to insure to themselves and to all other American citizens the right to employ the practitioner of his choice.

In regard to the questions you ask about Messrs. Flower, Miller, Carr, Englehart, and Huhn, I have forwarded a request to each one of them for the information desired, and will give it to you as soon as it is received.

I will say, however, that I know now that some of the statements your questions imply are true, and I know that others are not true.

You misunderstood me about Mr. Flower. I said he was not now associated with his brother in the patent-medicine business, but did not say that he had not been so associated. I may even have been mistaken in this; Mr. Flower will answer that.

Even if all the things implied in your letter were admitted, I fail to see that anything has been established which in the least proves your sweeping statement that our membership is composed for the most part of people "hard hit by the pure food and drug act," or that we are "gophers," or that our money is secured from patent medicine and adulterated food sources, or that it is expended for anything even remotely connected with this subject.

In every movement in support of a principle there are likely to be found three elements which may be made the subject of criticism. First, those who join the movement for selfish purposes; second, those who join out of resentment toward those whom the movement opposes; and, third, those who may have at one time been associated with those whom you oppose, but have changed their views.

In a membership of 200,000 it would be foolish for us to say positively that not a single one of the first two types has slipped in, and any information of this kind you have will be gladly received. We welcome and defend those of the third type.

But we know who and what practically all of our 200,000 members are, and we know that they are in no way interested in the subject which you state that they are there to defend.

Nor can we say that not a dollar has ever been received from such a source as that you claim, but we know that not a dollar has been received from such a source known to any of the directors, and that money received from such sources has been returned, and help offered by these sources has been declined.

We also know that the method of securing the funds was such, and we are sufficiently familiar with the details of where this money came from to be able to prove that neither you nor any of your doctor friends can possibly be more antagonistic to the interests you claim we received it from, and for whose interests you claim we expended it, than are those who subscribed 99 per cent of the money for the league's support.

I hope this answers your letter of May 11 to the extent which it can be answered at this time. You say you will ask us a great many helpful questions. We shall be glad to have them as fast as you can prepare them, so that we can be working on the data, and would suggest personal conferences at any time, an investigation of the league books, a talk with our fiscal agent, the Astor Trust Co., or anything else that may be helpful to you, and then when that is all over we will ask you to go back to the original article which you published under the title of "A Bad Bunch," and go over it carefully with us and see what, if any, of the statements there made you have been able to prove or we have been able to disprove.

And then, of course, we will ask you to correct the wrong that you have done, and we feel sure that you will do so.

Sincerely,

THE NATIONAL LEAGUE FOR MEDICAL FREEDOM,
H. E. LESAN,
Chairman Committee on Publicity and Education.

COLLIER'S,
416 WEST THIRTEENTH STREET,
New York City, May 16, 1911.

DEAR MR. LESAN: On account of the condition on which you write the inclosed letter, which I have put in brackets on the first page, I think it only fair that I should return it to you.

In trying to find out what you definitely deny I had no intention of binding myself to cooperate with you in anything I may write in the future. I certainly shall not do that. I was merely trying to have the oral protest which you made the other day put in writing to avoid any possible misunderstanding.

Yours, very truly, NORMAN HAPGOOD.

MAY 17, 1911.

Mr. NORMAN HAPGOOD,
Editor Collier's Weekly, New York City.

DEAR MR. HAPGOOD: Replying to your letter of May 16, in which you return my letter of the 15th written as a protest of the National League for Medical Freedom against certain untrue statements made in Collier's issue of May 6, under the caption "A bad bunch."

I have been unfortunate in expressing myself, or you have read something into my letter that was not there.

I certainly had no intention of endeavoring to bind you to cooperate with me in anything you might write in the future on this or any other subject.

My purpose was exactly as you say, and that was to have our protest put in writing, and to let all such written communications become the foundation of anything which you printed which purported to quote the National League for Medical Freedom.

Outside of what statements we make—for which we are entirely responsible—and such modifications of your ideas as such statements of ours may make, we are not endeavoring to influence what you say in Collier's, though, of course, we would hold you responsible for anything that you said that was not true, and especially so after we had given you the opportunity to learn the truth.

Therefore I am sending back to you my letter of May 15, with this note of explanation, and would like to hear from you in regard to it.

Sincerely, yours,

H. E. LESAN.

COLLIER'S, May 19, 1911.

DEAR MR. LESAN: Thanks for yours of the 18th, which was of much interest to me.

I heartily return your personal satisfaction regarding the opportunity to talk it over, and am sorry that no matter how clearly the facts may be agreed upon in the long run by us, our principles and beliefs must be widely divergent. What I wish to do, if possible, is to make clear my opinion of the work that Christian Science is doing in the world, while at the same time making clear my strong belief in the medical profession and in the harm that is done by organized opposition to that profession.

Yours, sincerely,

NORMAN HAPGOOD.

Mr. H. E. LESAN,

MAY 22, 1911.

Mr. NORMAN HAPGOOD,
Collier's Weekly, New York City.

DEAR MR. HAPGOOD: I wrote you the last of the week that not later than Monday we would put certain information in your hands, as per your request.

We feel, however, that the situation, from our standpoint at least, has been somewhat changed by your communication of May 19.

If we understand your letter correctly, it means that when we have established that the things you said in Collier's about the league were untrue, that you then expect to justify your attack—or even to continue it—on the ground that an organization which protests against any of the methods of the so-called regular medical profession is inimical to the public welfare.

The directors of the league feel, in view of their frankness in placing all the information at your disposal—quite as much to save you embarrassment as to prove our own position—that they should not go any further in giving you an opportunity to learn the facts until they have some indication from you as to your intentions—

First, in regard to correcting false statements in Collier's of May 6.

Second, as to your future intention toward the National League for Medical Freedom.

On receipt of satisfactory assurances that you mean to be fair in correcting the wrong done us on May 6, and that you will not use the information given you in confidence for the purpose of proving you are wrong in one set of statements, to support your attack from another direction, we will be glad to submit the information.

Without such assurances the directors feel that they should adopt some other course of setting themselves right before the public.

This is all said, however, without any intention of abridging your right to express your opinions as you choose, and with every confidence on the part of all of us that your intentions are perfectly fair in regard to statements of fact, and that you will so assure us.

Sincerely, yours, H. E. LESAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 16, 1911.

PAUL A. HARSCH,
Secretary National League for Medical Freedom,
New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of yesterday, in which you ask enlightenment as to questions propounded by Mr. Hapgood, of Collier's, is at hand. I will answer the questions in the order they are given:

"1. Did Mr. C. W. Miller, as a representative of the Legislature of Iowa, oppose the passage of the pure-food law in that State?"

Neither as a representative of the legislature or as a newspaper writer did I oppose the law in question. As a matter of fact the Iowa pure-food law was passed by the thirty-first general assembly whereas my legislative service did not begin until the thirty-second.

"2. Did he make a charge, decided to be false in court, that the Bremer County Medical Society had a fee schedule?"

With reference to this matter, I beg to state that there was never any denial of the fact that the Bremer County Medical Society had a fee schedule. The Bremer County Medical Society, in addition to its extortionate fee schedule, had a blacklist agreement under the terms of which any family in arrears to one member of the society and listed as poor pay by him would be refused attendance by any other member thereof save on a cash-in-advance basis or upon the order of the county commissioners or township trustees.

Because these agreements appeared to be in violation of the Iowa antitrust law the grand jury of my county found indictments against the physicians party thereto. I was summoned as a witness before the grand jury making these indictments, before whom I produced and gave into its hand an original copy of the fee schedule which had been printed for the guidance of the physician subscribing to it. The case never came to a formal trial, but all of the issues involved were thrashed out in a habeas corpus proceeding. The decision of the district court, subsequently confirmed by the supreme court, was that medical service was labor rather than a commodity, and that since the indicted physicians had but resorted to the ordinary devices of labor unions, they were without guilt in the eyes of the law. All of these various matters are referred to in some detail in the articles I contributed in the national magazines two years ago. Since I believe you have a copy of their compilation in your hands, would suggest that you submit them to Mr. Hapgood's perusal. Having turned his attention to this subject, I am inclined to believe he would find much in them both of interest and enlightenment.

In conclusion let me state that if wrongly accusing the Bremer County Medical Society of adopting a fee schedule would justify my description as part of a "bad bunch," the inference seems plain that the odium should be lifted from me and attached elsewhere, providing my accusation is shown to have been a simple statement of undisputed fact. Certainly no complaint would be lodged against me by Mr. Hapgood for making even an unfounded statement regarding the practices of a medical society that were not to its discredit, and I take it that he looks upon the employment of trust and union labor methods to extort unreasonable fees from the sick and ailing in the same light that I do. He seems wholly unaware of the fact, however, that practically all of the country medical societies affiliated with the American Medical Association maintain fee schedules such as I complained of with reference to the Bremer County Medical Society. He should be advised of this fact, along with the further fact that the supreme body not only urges the adoption of fee schedules by local societies, but goes so far as to suggest the prices that should be printed in them. Conclusive evidence on these points is furnished by the Journal of American Medicine, the official mouthpiece of the American Medical Association, and I would refer Mr. Hapgood in particular to the article from that publication which I submitted as part of my statement to the House committee at the hearing on the health bills last year.

I am glad that Mr. Hapgood is looking us up, and if he will display the same diligence in looking up the organization that is resorting to all manner of falsehood and misrepresentation for the purpose of discrediting the opposition to its selfish ambition, as I believe he will, the result can not be other than gratifying.

I beg to remain, very sincerely,

C. W. MILLER.

ATTITUDE OF CHRISTIAN SCIENTISTS TOWARD PURE-FOOD AND SANITARY LAWS.

Mr. President, in this connection I think it is well for me to correct an impression that prevails, no doubt very generally, in regard to the attitude of Christian Scientists toward pure-food laws, sanitation laws, and other laws of similar character. It is generally given out—and, I suppose, generally believed—that Christian Scientists are opposed to all such legislation, which is a very great mistake. They believe in all kinds of sanitation that is necessary and proper for the purpose of preserving health. We have not yet reached that stage when we can simply say we will ignore all material means of that kind for the purpose of bettering the condition of our people and that we can heal disease in some other way and without such precautions. Christian Scientists try to be reasonable with respect to such matters. While they may believe that theirs is a better way, that may sometime become the exclusive way of dealing with sickness and disease, yet they submit to such legislation as being proper and right under the circumstances. You never find any Christian Scientist undertaking to violate or to repudiate or to in any way interfere with the administration of such laws. I want to say now that there is no truth in this statement that this movement is in any way allied with the people who are opposing the pure-food laws. It has no such foundation. The people who are honestly and conscientiously opposing this legislation have no sympathy with the people who are opposing pure-food laws and other laws of a similar character.

DOCTORS' FEE BILLS.

Mr. President, there has been some indignant protest against the claim that is made that the American Medical Association is attempting to establish throughout this country fee bills to regulate the amount of charges that shall be made by doctors irrespective of their ability or competency to do the work which they are attempting to do. For the purpose of meeting that position and showing that we have not been unjust with respect to it, but that we are acting upon sufficient information, I desire to embody in my remarks an article that has been written by Dr. J. N. McCormack, to whom I have heretofore referred, with respect to this matter of fee bills, calling attention to the fact and urging that that sort of control should be established throughout the country. The reason why the American Medical Association has not declared for establishing fee bills within its own ranks is very apparent. They do not compose all of the doctors in any neighborhood or in any county or locality. Therefore, if they, as an organization, were to establish the fee bills and be regulated and bound by them, the other physicians of the neighborhood would not, and consequently they would be at a disadvantage.

But the man who speaks for them, the man who is in a sense their walking delegate, goes about the country and advocates the establishment of these fixed charges, and says, in that connection, that it would not do for a part of the physicians in any locality to establish fee bills, but that it should be done by all of them. Therefore he is using the power of the American Medical Association to bring into that organization not only the members of the association itself, but all the physicians in any given locality where they are willing to be bound by such regulations. That will be proved by the article of the doctor himself, who is quite frank on that subject. It is as follows:

MEDICAL ECONOMICS, BY DR. J. N. M'CORMACK.

[From the Journal of the American Medical Association.]

The county societies and postgraduate courses furnish the facilities for doing the scientific and social features of this work. For the business side of it I am advising that the profession in each county or city consider the advisability of arranging for systematic monthly collections with a carefully selected business representative and a centrally located "medical collector's office," the collector to be under bond and on a definite salary, and with authority to appoint as many assistants as may be necessary, for whom he is responsible, very much as sheriffs and city collectors do.

The collector should be a man of tact and judgment; he should hold the affairs of each physician as strictly private and confidential, and he should be well paid.

* * * * * * *

For obvious reasons the schedule should be adopted by the profession as a whole or as individuals and not by the county society. The provision in the by-laws forbidding such action by the societies, inserted after careful consideration, was certainly wise under the conditions then and still existing, and probably should be permanently retained.

The membership in most societies embrace only about from one-half to three-fourths of the physicians of the county. While it is probable that all, including the former sectarians, will finally come in, this will be the work of years, and, although not absolutely essential, it is important that the schedule be agreed to pratically by all the active physicians of the jurisdiction, whether members or not.

The rates should not be too hard and fixed. There are people of moderate circumstances in almost every community—factory operatives and others—who ought to pay something, and yet should not pay full fee, and a wise discretion on this and similar points must be provided for in any plan which is to be comprehensive and successful. The orders for arrangement and the items of practice included are as seems best suited for most counties and communities, but the purpose is to make it so simple and flexible that it can be altered to suit varying conditions and views. For instance, if it is thought best, fees for fractures and dislocations or any other surgical or special work can be easily added. It will be noted that a broad distinction is made between ordinary and complete office examinations, including a thorough examination of the chest, urinalysis, and other like work involving extra time and skill. My own opinion is that a double charge should be made for night practice for well-to-do people, but I have yielded to the views of others on this point. Telephone practice is so annoying, exacting, and unsatisfactory that it certainly should be paid for, except where regular visits are being made, and in all cases after bedtime. Consultations are purposely made low in order to develop and encourage this variety of practice.

The form of schedule suggested and the footnote as they should go on the placard are as follows:

Schedule of medical fees for ——— County.

Day visit in town	$2.00
Night visit in town	3.00
Day visit in country, first mile, $2; each after mile, one way	1.00
Night visit in country, first mile, $3; each after mile, one way	1.50
Ordinary office examination and advice	1.00
Complete examination and advice	5.00
Advice or prescription by telephone	1.00
Obstetric case, uncomplicated, not over 6 hours	15.00
Life-insurance examinations	5.00

Consultation, double ordinary visit.
Surgical and other special fees as may be arranged.

I have also, Mr. President, a letter here from B. O. Flower, president of the League for Medical Freedom, and a statement accompanying it showing the falsity of the articles in Collier's Weekly. They are as follows:

[Extracts from letter of Mr. Flower.]

BOSTON, MASS., June 28, 1911.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate Chamber,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: Mr. Hapgood's article is a tissue of misrepresentations, and misrepresentations that were knowingly made. For example, I wrote a letter to Mr. Lesan, which he forwarded to Hapgood, in which I stated that I had devoted my entire time to literary work from 1889; that I had not invested one dollar, directly or indirectly, in proprietary medicines or in any other business matters outside of the publication business; that my position in regard to proprietary medicines and the protection of the people from drugs and poisons had always been outspoken and on the side of genuine protection for the people. After one year of investigation, trying to find something in my record or history that he could use to discredit me, he so signally fails that he singles out a member of my family and seeks to discredit me through assailing that member, although I have never had a particle of business relations with that member since 1889 and that party has never been connected directly or indirectly with the National League for Medical Freedom. The dragging of the name in was done, of course, to try to discredit me. In the same way he has tried to discredit Mr. Miller by innuendoes and false implications. His attack on Mrs. Belais was one of the most shameful and insulting characterizations possible, aimed against a woman of remarkably clear mental vision, of strong moral convictions, high minded, and in every way worthy of esteem. Of our entire advisory board Hapgood is able to find three persons that he claims have been interested in or have defended proprietary medicines. Mr. Huhn is connected with a proprietary medicine concern, but in that concern there are over 2,000 members of the American Medical Association, the association that is pretending to be so desirous of driving out of business proprietary medicines.

I am taking the liberty of inclosing to you a detailed statement in regard to Collier's article, which I have prepared. This is sent to you because I thought you might like to have the data in case any questions should come up relating to points in this article. I have gone somewhat into the details in regard to what Hapgood stated about my connection with my brother's company—a connection which he knew ended in 1889, but which, in his paper, he stated extended to 1899, or about 10 years after the company had gone out of business. I have also gone into considerable detail in regard to other members of my own family and my own literary work, etc. All this is offensive and unpleasant to me. I had preferred not to mention anything about my family relations or my own work, but since Collier's has attacked me on account of one member of my family, I felt I was justified in referring to other members of the family who have held large and honorable positions on both sides of the water, and I have mentioned my own work simply for the purpose of giving to you the opportunity, if any attack was made upon me any time, to refer to what I had done. The other points in this communication, I think, you may find helpful to you.

Cordially, yours, B. O. FLOWER.

STATEMENT OF LEAGUE FOR MEDICAL FREEDOM IN ANSWER TO ARTICLE IN COLLIER'S WEEKLY.

1. In the recent attack made by Collier's on the National League for Medical Freedom, thoughtful and intelligent readers can not fail to be impressed with the fact that this journal makes no attempt to meet the arguments or the position taken by the league and its representatives; no attempt to consider whether the position taken is sound, reasonable, and in accord with the spirit of democracy, the rightful freedom of the people, and the best interests of scientific advance. This journal starts out with the assumption that the ever-changing fads, theories, and dogmas of the so-called regular school of medicine are the infallible truths, and that those who question the right of these would-be, self-appointed censors of public health to secure compulsory medication and the enactment of legislation inimical to the rights of the citizen—legislation that would tend to prevent him from employing the practitioner of his choice or which would compel him to submit to treatments that he believes to be dangerous—are enemies to the public weal; that their motives should be impugned and their views misrepresented, and they should be made the victim of abusive epithets. Instead of a free, candid, fair discussion of the merits of the issues and arguments involved, such as would be worthy of honorable journalism, this publication chooses to attack individuals and substitute epithets and innuendoes for arguments. It is no new thing to find those who feel they can not meet arguments or successfully refute the position taken by an antagonist, to resort to mud slinging. This is precisely what Collier's has done, and, in this instance, the attempt is so pitifully weak that only by resorting to the subterfuges of the pettifogger could it hope to throw dust in the eyes of even its most careless and superficial readers. Here we find misstatements of facts and unwarranted inferences hand in hand with unjustifiable interpretations and insulting epithets, which the defenders of a bad cause so often rely on to enable them to ignore arguments and which they hope may so discredit the opposition that its reasons and arguments will not carry the weight that they merit. Let us examine the facts.

2. The editor of Collier's, before he penned his misleading article, had in his possession the facts that the president of the league had, since 1889, or for more than 20 years, devoted his entire time to editorial and literary work, and that during this time he had not invested one dollar in any proprietary medicine or drug concern whatsoever, nor had he received one dollar directly or indirectly from such source, and that no relative or friend, so far as he knew, had directly or indirectly any interest of any description in any proprietary medicine for sometime prior to the organization of the National League for Medical Freedom or since its organization. These facts were placed in the hands of the editor of Collier's so that he would not inadvertently make any false statements. Yet in the article in Collier's the statement is made that the president of the league was an officer in a medical company from 1885 to 1899 It is a fact, which the president of the league has never denied, that during the eighties of the last century he served for a time as secretary to a brother who enjoyed a large medical practice, numbering among his patients a great many persons of prominence, such as Col. Thomas A. Scott, Joseph Jefferson, the actor, and scores of other prominent persons, who testified to the fact that under his treatment they had received great benefits after failing to receive benefits from other physicians. During this period a company was organized to place on the market a few of the remedies that had seemed to be particularly effective in a great number of cases. At this time this brother also had a sanitarium in Boston with a staff of able medical assistants. One of these has since been a State examiner on the board of health in Massachusetts. In 1889 the president of the league severed all business connections with his brother and devoted his entire time to literary work, and he was not in any way connected with the business, directly or indirectly, after 1889, and not 1899, as stated by Collier's.

After a year's searching to find something against the president of the league that could be used in a mud-slinging campaign, the editor confesses his weakness by denouncing another member of the president's family, who never had any connection, directly or indirectly, with the league, and with whom the president of the league has had no business connections for more than a score of years. To try to discredit one man by attacking another member of his family may serve the purpose of such a sheet as Collier's, that prefers epithets to arguments, but it is not a method that will appeal to fair-minded or reason-governed persons.

If the editor had taken the trouble to investigate the family of the president, he would have found that if one of its members had been discredited in the public mind a great number of others had occupied positions of honor and enjoyed the love and respect of millions of people.

The eldest brother of the president was, to the time of his death, one of the leading pulpit orators and pastors in the Church of the Disciples, or Christian Church—the church to which President Garfield belonged. His father was, for more than 60 years, or to the time of his death at the age of 84, an honored and successful minister in the Disciple Church, being one of the pioneers in that denomination and the founder of scores of flourishing churches. A great-uncle of the president, Edward Fordham Flower, settled in Stratford-on-Avon, England. He was several times elected mayor of Stratford. One of his sons, Charles, was the chief promoter and contributor to the building of the famous Shakespearean Memorial Theater, of Stratford. Another brother, Edward, did more than any other person to restore historic Stratford, to preserve such historic buildings as the Ann Hathaway cottage, the birthplace of Shakespeare, etc. A third son was the celebrated English scientist, naturalist, and surgeon, Sir William H. Flower. He was the author of over 300 published works, one of Queen Victoria's surgeons, and, for many years prior to his death, head of the department of natural history of the British Museum. Sir William H. Flower was one of the principal contributors on natural-history subjects to the ninth edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica. It was Sarah Flower Adams, another of the president's ancestors, who penned the world-famous hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee." These are but a few relatives of the president of the league, who have justly won a commanding place in public affection and esteem because they have been servants of progress and civilization.

During the past 22 years the president of the league, besides being the editor of the Arena and later of the Twentieth Century Magazine, has written a number of important volumes, embracing historical works, social and economic studies, biographies, and literary criticisms. Most of these volumes have enjoyed large circulation in America, England, and Australasia, and at least one of the works has been translated into German and published in Berlin. Among his leading cloth-bound volumes are: The Century of Sir Thomas More, an historical survey of the first century of modern times; How England Averted a Revolution of Force, an historical study of the first 10 years of Queen Victoria's reign; Civilization's Inferno, or Studies in the Social Cellar; The New Time, a plea for the union of the moral forces for practical progress; Whittier: Prophet, Poet, and Man; Gerald Massey: Poet, Prophet, and Mystic; Lessons Learned from Other Lives, a book of short biographical sketches; and Persons, Places, and Ideas, a volume of literary and critical essays.

Here is a man who for 22 years has been in public life and has been under the full glare of publicity, aggressively battling for political, social, and economic justice, an editor and author of distinction, a man loved best by those who know him best, and universally respected by those who are acquainted with his life, a man who, as the editor of Collier's knew before he wrote his article, had devoted the past 22 years of his life entirely to literary work and the furtherance of fundamental democracy and economic advancement, and during this time had not invested one dollar in proprietary medicines or received a dollar from any proprietary or drug interest, and that he had not only not advocated or defended proprietary medicines, but had advocated legislation, as will be presently shown, that would compel every manufacturer of proprietary medicines to clearly label the exact contents of his remedies; and this person is cited by Collier's as a leading officer of the league to prove that the league is interested in and supported by the proprietary-medicine interests. After months' or a year's investigation Collier's find it necessary to seek to discredit the president by attacking a relative with whom the president has had no business connections for more than a score of years. But this is not all.

The editor of Collier's evidently felt it necessary to convey the idea that this man, who he knows had not for more than a score of years invested a dollar in any proprietary medicine or drug interest or received a dollar from any such interest, and who has no relations or friends engaged in this business, was a defender of patent medicines, else his claim would be so palpably absurd as to render his journal ridiculous in the eyes of thinking people. So what does he do? He searches to find out some line in the president's writings that might be construed as in advocacy of proprietary medicines. He could not have failed to find that here, as elsewhere, the president had been outspoken and fearless in the expression of his opinions, but he must also have seen that his demands and suggestions for safeguarding the people's rights were the very thing that the proprietary medicine interests would most strongly oppose if the medicines were, as the editor of Collier's would have the people believe, composed of dangerous poisons or habit-forming drugs or otherwise worthless compositions. Instead of daring to copy any comprehensive statement of Mr. Flower on the subject of proprietary medicines, because he knew it would utterly discredit and disprove Collier's claims, this editor resorts to one of the most contemptible methods of misrepresentation that a sensational journalist can stoop to. He takes one sentence apart from the context and dismisses it as if it was one of many statements favorable to proprietary medicine interests. Thus, he says: "His views on patent medicines are often expressed. For instance: 'I think that a great majority of proprietary medicines are infinitely less dangerous to the public than the majority of regular doctors' prescriptions.'" In passing it may be observed that Mr. Flower stands firmly on this position, holding that the great majority of proprietary medicines have been simple remedies that, in the hands of successful family physicians, have seemed to work cures, and that the great majority of men who to-day are under the influence of opium, chloral, cocaine, and other habit-forming drugs have been brought to their present condition through physicians' prescriptions, and that the great majority of dangerous medicines administered to the people have been and are being given by the regular profession.

The editor of Collier's spoke truly when he said the president's "views are often expressed," but he did not dare to give the public those well-known views, simply because to do so would expose his own insincerity. For the benefit of the public, and to show how thoroughly Collier's statement misrepresents the president's position on this question, we give below his unequivocal views in regard to patent medicines and the rights of the people as published nearly a year ago, that the readers may judge for themselves:

"DRUG CONSUMPTION AND THE PUBLIC.

"Passing from the consideration of foods to that of drugs and medicines, we find ourselves in the presence of general charges, some of them not worthy of special attention and others calling for serious consideration.

"It is claimed that the people of the United States annually spend many millions of dollars for patent or proprietary medicines, and some of our medical brethren have pointed out that this amount of money is thus lost to the profession. They might even go much further and say that the amount paid by the people would probably be far greater if they were forced to depend upon the doctors instead of the family medicines, for a bottle of some simple or family medicine frequently prevents the family sending for a doctor for many common ailments and thus incurring a bill many times greater than the cost of several bottles of medicines.

"We hold no brief for the proprietary-medicine manufacturers, and would heartily favor any legislation that would compel full publicity as to the nature and composition of the various medicines so popular with the people, provided the same measure of wholesome publicity be extended to the doctors' prescriptions, for we believe the people have a right to know what they take and that no class of vendors or prescribers of foods or medicines should be immune.

"It is true that not a few of the old and popular proprietary remedies were originally favorite prescriptions of family physicians enjoying large practices. The medicines that were later put on the market had seemed to be peculiarly efficacious, and the doctor or some druggist subsequently began their manufacture and sale to the public. In recent years, since the craze for getting rich has become a national mania, a number of new preparations, some of them said to contain small quantities of opium, chloral, cocaine, and other habit-forming drugs, have been put on the market, and the charge is made that in certain instances the drugs contained in these medicines might easily lead to death through carelessness of the consumer, or in other instances there is grave danger of brain and nerve destroying habits following the use of the medicines. The first charge is far less serious than the second. As a matter of fact, few manufacturers of proprietary medicines would dare to take any risk with the careless general purchaser of drugs by putting large quantities of any deadly poison in his preparations, even if such drugs were not too expensive to be used in such preparations.

"The charge that there are medicines on the market containing sufficient opium in some form, or cocaine or chloral, to lead to drug habits on the part of innocent victims deserves serious consideration, for in our age of stress, business excitement, rush, and worry a large proportion of our people have little reserve or resisting power, and stimulents and habit-forming drugs soon play havoc with their victims. We hold that under no circumstances whatever should any habit-forming drug be dispensed without the consumer's full knowledge as to what he is taking, and if such drugs are to be dispensed in any way that there should be legal requirements compelling every manufacturer of any preparation containing any poison or habit-forming drug to put a red label on every bottle or package, on which should be printed in plain English the name of the drug and the amount of the same used in the preparation. This we believe to be a rightful protection that should be demanded, and a penalty should follow any attempt on the part of manufacturers to deceive the consumer by failure thus to warn him of the dangerous drugs contained in the preparations.

"IMPERATIVE NECESSITY OF PUBLICITY IN THE PRESCRIPTION OF ALL HABIT-FORMING DRUGS.

"But this protection does not go far enough. It entirely ignores the chief cause of the alarming increase in the drug habit among our people. We think it is quite safe to say that at least 90 per cent of the victims of opium, chloral, cocaine, and other brain and nerve-destroying drugs contract these habits through prescriptions given by regular doctors, and in a large number of cases the patients are entirely ignorant of the nature of the drug that is administered or of the fact that they are taking any habit-forming poison. When one thinks of the great army of victims of opium, chloral, and cocaine, whose lives have been wrecked and who are dragging out a living death, who were innocently introduced to these enslaving drugs by physicians, he realizes the imperative need for prompt legislation compelling every physician who prescribes these medicines to write the prescription in plain English, in red ink, as red, being the poison color, would help warn the patient of lurking danger in the prescription. This legal regulation would give the patient a needed protection. Then, if he desired to take the risk, he could do so, but it would give him the chance to escape what in thousands and tens of thousands of cases has proved a fatal curse innocently contracted by the taking of medicines about the composition of which he was ignorant.

"Will the political doctors, who have been so loudly clamoring for the protection of the people from proprietary medicines supposed to contain minute proportions of some habit-forming drug, join us in demanding that the people be made acquainted with the presence of such drugs in all preparations and in all prescriptions which go into their hands?

"That in the great majority of cases where persons have contracted the drug habit they first acquired a taste for the poison from doctors' prescriptions, will not, we imagine, be questioned. That the people have a right to know of their peril before running the risk of coming under the influence of opium and other subtle poisons is evident. Hence, if the solicitations of our medical brethren for protection of the "dear people" are sincere, they certainly will unite in this demand to afford genuine protection without vicious class distinction. If they are honest in their pretensions and realize the magnitude of the curse, they will join in urging that the chief source of this evil, no less than minor sources, be brought under such legal provisions as will give the people at least protective knowledge. If, on the other hand, the political doctors are merely bent on building up a great nation-wide Medical Trust or monopoly, and are using this plea as the advocates of special legislation among the physicians in the various States have been wont to use similar pleas when seeking restrictive legislation, they will oppose this genuine attempt to protect the people. And we confess that we have small hope of the aid of the drug-dispensing political doctors in this important crusade, and one thing that makes us doubt is their action when an opportunity similar to the above was given them in the State of Iowa. There a measure was introduced providing for the use of red labels on certain proprietary medicines. The second vice president of the National League for Medical Freedom, Hon. Charles W. Miller, a member of the legislature, while approving the legislation provided it be made general and not class in character, and provided it be so shaped as to afford real protection for the people, amended the proposed bill by providing that physicians who dispensed opium, chloral, and similar drugs should write their prescriptions in plain English, in red ink. This simple and thoroughly proper amendment created consternation in the camp of the political doctors, and every effort was made to have the amendment stricken out. Failing in this, the bill was defeated.

"Clearly, if the protection of the people is the purpose of our lawmakers, and not the aggrandizement of a great privilege-seeking class, the laws enacted must be so comprehensive as to include in their scope the class chiefly responsible for the evils against which the citizen is to be warned, as in the case of habit-forming drugs.

"Nothing is more vicious than class legislation or legislation that gives special advantage to a class or classes. Indeed, now as never before is it vitally important to scrutinize all legislation proposed, to see if there is not behind it some great special interest seeking power or financial advantage as a result of the proposed laws or enactments. Never has there been a time when it was so imperatively necessary to carefully frame laws so as to prevent any class, profession, sect, or group of people from gaining a position that might enable them to infringe on the rights of the individual through legislative warrant or bureaucratic rulings."

We venture the prediction that a law passed for the genuine protection of the people, such as Mr. Flower advocates above, would do more to protect the people from the danger of the drug habit and to defend and protect them from being made the victims of deception on the part of proprietary medicine manufacturers or doctors, than all the class medical legislation that the monopoly-seeking doctors have secured during the past 50 years, but such legislation would not promote the monopoly the political doctors are seeking, and would protect the people from dangerous prescriptions as well as questionable medicines that may be put upon the market. It would be important and genuine protective legislation in so far as the people are concerned, and it would not be class legislation in the interest of the increased power and wealth for State-protected or privileged doctors. Hence such legislation would be opposed by the political doctors just as it was opposed by them when offered by the Hon. Charles W. Miller in the Iowa Legislature.

3. Next we come to notice the attack by insinuation on the Hon. Charles W. Miller, second vice president of the league. This attack is as follows:

"Charles W. Miller, second vice president of the league, was also one of the founders. In his newspaper, which publishes patent-medicine advertising, he has constantly fought the medical profession. Last year one of his addresses against what he called 'a doctors' trust' was delivered to the Dairy Association of Baltimore. We may say in passing that Collier's does not believe in freedom to sell tuberculosis milk any more than it does to sell tuberculosis meat."

Mr. Miller has for years been the Democratic leader of the Iowa Legislature, and was formerly State chairman of the Democratic Party. His position shows the confidence of his own neighbors and of his party in his intelligence and uprightness. He owned until lately a county newspaper, and it is probable that he published proprietary medicine advertisements in his columns, as does almost every struggling county newspaper in the land. Mr. Miller has opposed the attempts of the doctors to blacklist other physicians in the interest of the doctors' monopoly or union. He opposed the attempt to raise the fee scale that would take vast sums from the pockets of the struggling farmers and working men and women unfortunate enough to be sick, and he tried to secure legislation that would compel the doctors to write their prescriptions which contained deadly poisons and habit-forming drugs in plain English and in red ink, so that their patients might enjoy at least measurable protection against drugs that might easily enslave them or injure their constitutions. All these things, which right-minded people will heartily applaud, were doubtless grievous offenses in the eyes of Drs. Simmons, McCormack, and Reed, the three master spirits in building up the politico-medical machine of the American Medical Association, and also in the eyes of Collier's, which appears to hold a brief for this association. Again, it is doubtless true, as Collier's points out, that Mr. Miller appeared before a dairy association, just as he has appeared before the congressional committee and has appeared before various other public bodies, to protest against the monopoly-seeking legislation of the American Medical Association. To point out the trust character of the legislation sought by the political doctors may be a serious offense in the eyes of Collier's, but it is not likely to impress any unbiased or fair-minded person as being other than a perfectly proper proceeding, provided his position was well taken and his argument convincing, and all persons who have listened to Mr. Miller's arguments or read his addresses will, we think, be impressed with the fact that he has clearly established his claims, and it will be observed that Collier's very carefully refrains from giving Mr. Miller's arguments. We venture to say that if they had published the address in full ninety-nine out of every hundred unbiased readers of that publication would have unhesitatingly declared that the member of the Iowa Legislature had thoroughly maintained his contention.

4. Next we come to Collier's attack on Mrs. Diana Belais. Perhaps nothing in this whole discreditable and shameless exhibition of the Collier brand of journalism is more characteristic or more calculated to arouse the contempt of all right-minded people than the following:

"Mrs. Diana Belais, a director and also a founder, has appeared before in this paper as president of an antiexperiment society—a well-meaning, but ignorant, reckless, and muddle-headed agitator."

Mrs. Belais is the president of the New York State Anti-Vivisection Society. She is a clear-visioned, logical, and intellectually brilliant woman, whose enlightened conscience revolts against the horrible sufferings imposed by the vivisectors on helpless dumb animals. With her stand such distinctly great scientific physicians as Dr. Edward Berdoe, M. R. C. S. (England) and L. R. C. P. (Edinburgh), one of England's greatest physicians, medical authors, and scientific investigators, and other physicians of international reputation.

Mrs. Belais's offense in the eyes of Collier's is that she has dared to oppose what thousands of the most enlightened of our people hold to be brutal, unnecessary, and dehumanizing cruelty practiced on dumb animals. The doctors wish a free hand in their reckless experimentation, and Collier's, in lieu of arguments to oppose Mrs. Belais's strong and reason-compelling pleas, resorts to abusive epithets against a high-minded, cultured, and thoroughly civilized woman, glibly characterizing her as "ignorant, reckless, and muddle-headed."

Last summer Mrs. Belais delivered an address before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives in Washington that was strong, clearly reasoned, and logical—an address which called forth a number of expressions of sincere admiration from those present, some of whom were not in sympathy with the league in its position. But because Mrs. Belais intelligently and ably opposes cruel experimentation on helpless animals, she is denounced as "ignorant, reckless, and muddle-headed" by this modern champion of monopoly-seeking doctors and twentieth century example of the chivalry of the press.

We confess we are surprised that W. R. Brown, first vice president of the league and manager of the Brown-Ketcham Co., one of the great steel constructing concerns of this country, escaped criticism, for is it not possible that some of the buildings erected by this company may to-day house druggists who make or at least sell proprietary medicines? Then there is Dr. Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, registrar and professor of materia medica in the Hahnemann Medical College, of Kansas City, Mo., one of the ablest educators, authors, and physicians in the homeopathic school; Dr. Harry C. Chiles, one of the leading osteopaths of the land. Both these men are representative and influential members in their schools of practice and are active directors in the league, and, as Collier's must know, would not actively associate with any organization that was promoted by the proprietary medicine interests or those who opposed pure-food legislation. Then there is Col. Frederick C. Bangs, another active director, who is a prominent attorney in Chicago. Is it possible that Collier's sleuths have been unable to discover some instance where Col. Bangs may have been consulted by a druggist or some person who makes or sells proprietary medicines?

5. So much for the active officers of the league. Next Collier's attacks the personnel of the advisory board of the league. Out of 200 members of this board the editor of Collier's has been able to discover but 3 persons who either at some time were interested in proprietary medicine interests or who have defended the proprietary medicine interests against the champions of the ethical remedies, many of which are deadly poisons, but which are approved by the American Medical Association. He finds that S. C. Carr, the editor of the Columbus Medical Journal, was at one time interested in a proprietary medical concern; that George P. Englehard, editor of the Medical Standard, has defended proprietary medicine interests; and that Charles Huhn, president of the National Association of Retail Druggists, is an officer in a cooperative proprietary medical concern. After a year Collier's sleuths have actually found 3 persons out of 200 who are or have been connected with proprietary medicine interests or who have had the temerity to say a good word for these medicines, and all this is advanced to prove that the National League for Medical Freedom is, to use the elegant language of this journal of civilization, "a bad bunch," and that it is opposed to pure-food legislation and an upholder of proprietary medicine interests. Collier's very wisely refrains from calling attention to the advisory board of the league as a whole, as its list contains as notable a company of strong, fine, public-spirited men and women as we think have ever appeared on an advisory board of any organization.

A few typical names on this list will show why Collier's does not care to mention the personnel of the advisory board. Among the distinguished physicians are: Dr. William E. Leonard, for 19 years professor of materia medica in the University of Minnesota; Dr. A. F. Stephens, one of the leading physicians, educators, and authors of the eclectic school of medicine; Dr. W. A. Dewey, editor of the Medical Century, one of the largest homeopathic journals published; Dr. Joseph D. Harrigan, New York City, a prominent homeopathic physician; Dr. John Perrins, vice president of the National Eclectic Medical Association; Dr. George W. Thompson, president of the faculty of the Eclectic College of New York; Dr. Claude E. Laws, president of the Arkansas State Eclectic Board of Medical Examiners; Edmund Vance Cook, author and lecturer; Charles Major, the popular author; William Ordway Partridge, the eminent sculptor; Orison S. Marden, editor of Success; Mrs. Clara Barton; Mrs. John Logan; Mrs. George T. Oliver; May Wright Sewall; ex-United States Senator William V. Allen; William D. Baldwin, president of the Otis Elevator Co., of New York City; Col. Robert C. Clowry, ex-president of the Western Union Telegraph Co.; Benage S. Joselin, president of the Portland Railway, Light & Power Co.; and Edwin T. Earl, publisher of the Los Angeles Express. These names are typical representatives of the advisory board and the membership of the National League for Medical Freedom—the league which Collier's would have its credulous readers believe is the enemy of the public weal.

Evidently fearing the loss of subscriptions from Christian Scientists, Collier's throws this sop to them: "Few mere observers rate the benefits that Christian Science has brought the community more highly than we do." And yet the fact remains, and none know this fact better than Collier's, that the American Medical Association, whose program is so enthusiastically indorsed by Collier's, through its State societies has been seeking and is seeking tirelessly to secure legislation that would prevent Christian Scientists from practicing, and thus deprive tens and hundreds of thousands of intelligent American people from the enjoyment of this treatment when they desire its administration. At the present time in the city in which Collier's magazine is published the New York Medical Society, a component part of the State society, which in turn is an integral part of the American Medical Association, is trying through the courts to harass Christian Science practitioners under legislation which the doctors claimed when it was passed would not interfere with such practice.

6. The league has consistently from the beginning addressed itself to appeals to the reason of the public by arguments and citations of facts to maintain its position. It has held that certain great vital issues are at stake, issues vital to the most sacred rights of the people, and also to the cause of sound scientific advancement, and it has chosen to advance arguments rather than to indulge in abusive epithets. It has refused to engage in a mud-slinging campaign, and has only asked that the issues involved be fairly met and freely discussed, but in passing it may be pardoned for venturing an observation as a possible explanation for the activity of Collier's in its militant championing of the American Medical Association and the political doctors.

Some years ago when Collier's was preparing to attack the proprietary medicines its canvassers were sent to the doctors with special inducements to subscribe. A well-known physician thus describes the methods of the canvasser who approached him: After extolling Collier's and showing a book premium that made the magazine practically a free gift or the book a free gift if the doctor would consent to take Collier's—we do not remember now which way the matter was put by the canvasser—he next proceeded to enlarge on the fact that the American people were paying out millions of dollars every year for proprietary medicines that ought to go into the pockets of the doctors. Now, he explained Collier's proposed to make a great campaign against the proprietary medicines, and this would naturally greatly increase the revenues of the doctors. Therefore the doctors should support Collier's. This was the substance of the canvasser's song, and doubtless through this method Collier's received a great number of physicians as subscribers. Naturally enough they desire to retain this clientele, and there is nothing discreditable about their desire to do so, even by opposing the league, provided that in doing so they employ honorable methods of argument instead of resorting to a mud-slinging attack marked by vituperations, abusive epithets, and unjustifiable inuendos. Had the league desired to turn aside from its campaign addressed to the reason and sense of fairness of the people and marked by arguments, historical facts, and legitimate conclusions to a criticism of the personnel of the master spirits of the opposition, it could have easily dwelt at length on the damaging and unrefuted charges that have been advanced against a number of those who have been chiefly responsible for building up the political machine of the American Medical Association, but it has striven to hold to principles, and not cloud its issues by injecting personalities into its campaign, feeling that its cause was just, righteous, and in the interests of the cause of scientific advance no less than of the people's rights.

SCOPE AND PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

Mr. President, I now come to a consideration of the scope of the bill itself as it is presented. In order to show what the position and understanding of the Senator from Oklahoma, the author of the bill, is, I desire to read a few words from what he said before the Senate committee having a similar bill under consideration:

Senator OWEN. Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to make a statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Senator OWEN. I wish to say that the only important point in this bill is the coordination of the principal health agencies of the Government; the detail of it is a matter that is immaterial. The only question of importance is—and the only question upon which I personally desire to have the evidence is—the desirability of a department with a seat in the Cabinet. I do not care anything about the details. If the committee determines on a department then the details could be arranged, but the time is very short.

I also want in this connection to include in my remarks a short extract from an address of H. L. Gordon before the committee having the matter under consideration, setting out in a very brief way the objections to the bill. It is as follows:

AT THE MERCY OF OFFICIALS.

If you place in the hands of these men a power which has no limitations or restrictions, as I have said before, and which does not attempt to designate where or when or how an investigation as to some particular sickness or disease shall be made, if you give him the authority which the language of this bill unquestionably gives him, to determine for himself the necessity of such an investigation, and to act in accordance with that determination, even though the person afflicted with the disease which is to be investigated may have not even a remote connection with interstate commerce, you place the citizenship of this country absolutely at the mercy of the men who are connected with the Public Health Service.

Of course, it might be said that an individual under those circumstances could have relief by objecting to the authority of these people, and by resorting to the courts for an enforcement of his personal and individual rights. But, gentlemen of the committee, it must not be forgotten that the great respect which the citizenship of this country has for everything and everybody which bears the badge or acts with the authority of the Federal Government would prevent and make impossible in most cases the questioning of the authority with which these men would be clothed under this bill.

And it must not be further forgotten that this bill provides not only for the study and investigation of diseases of man, but it "authorizes the study and investigation of the conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof," and that therefore it is not putting the case too strongly when we suggest that this not only authorizes the invasion of the homes of this country for the purpose of investigating some particular sickness or disease that may exist there, but it authorizes the invasion of those homes for the further purpose of investigating the conditions that surround them, to enable the particular representative of the Public Health Service who may be making the investigation to determine from his standpoint and according to the teachings of his school of medicine what the cause of that disease might be.

A MONOPOLY THE AIM.

But there is one fact which, it seems to me, plays a very important part in determining whether or not such a power as this should be given to the Public Health Service. It is a fact, as I am informed, and it is a fact that should have great weight with this committee and with every Member of the National Congress in considering legislation of this kind, that the men in whose hands the powers delegated by this bill are put all belong to one school of medicine. And it does not change the situation, nor does it weaken the effect of the argument in opposition to this bill, that this particular school of medicine is the one upon which I call, or upon which you call, when we believe medical assistance to be necessary for ourselves or our families.

Indeed I have no hesitancy in stating to this committee that the men who represent the Federal Government in its health activities are all from the school of medicine which I always employ when I feel the necessity of calling upon anyone because of the impaired health of myself or my family. But because of my relations with these men it does not change the situation with reference to my attitude toward legislation of this kind. Indeed I might say to this committee that the very man who is my family physician and adviser is one of the leading lights in the organization which is back of and prompting all this sort of legislation, but I recognize the fact that in his activity he is only pushing forward the interest of himself and those whom he represents, which interests are not such as should influence this committee or the Congress of the United States in carrying out their wishes.

The fact is, gentlemen of the committee, that if the public health service is given the power which this particular provision of this bill would confer upon it, this particular school of medicine, which fills every position under the health activities of this Government, would be enabled, through the power and money of the Federal Government, to disseminate its views as to the causes of disease and as to the remedies which should be adopted by the citizenship of this country, to the exclusion of all the other opinions and remedies of the many other schools of medicine in this country.

In Ohio the advisory board, which acts for and represents the people for whom I appear in this case, is composed of one of the most prominent and influential homeopathic physicians in the city of Cincinnati; of the leader of the school of osteopathy in that city; of a lawyer, who, like myself, still follows and believes in the teachings of the school of medicine which controls the activities of the health interests in the Federal Government. These men are active in this movement not because they are opposed to the protection of the health of the people, not because they are prejudiced against any particular school of medicine, but because they are opposed to the Federal Government placing in the hands of one particular school of medicine the funds and the activities of this Government, by which the ideas and the conclusions of that particular school may be disseminated and scattered broadcast among the people of this country at the expense of the Federal Government.

BASIS OF OBJECTION.

That is why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the homeopath and the osteopath and the eclectic physicians all unite in this protest against this sort of legislation and call upon you to consider their interests as well as the interests of those men who already control and fill the various positions under the Federal Government which are created under the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Now, I call attention to the provisions of the bill which seem to me to be important in this connection; and on the first page, commencing with line 5, is this clause:

And the provisions of title 4 of the Revised Statutes, including all amendments thereto, are hereby made applicable to said department.

Now, that, on the face of it, is a very innocent reference. One would hardly realize, I think, all that it means. In order that Senators may understand just what is brought into this bill by that reference I desire very briefly to call attention to title 4 of the Revised Statutes, made a part of the bill.

Section 158, found on page 26 of the Revised Statutes, is as follows:

The provisions of this title shall apply to the following executive departments:

Then the departments are enumerated, and, of course, if this bill were adopted it would add one more to the number of departments. Then follows this section:

Each head of a department is entitled to a salary of $10,000 a year, to be paid monthly. * * *

Also:

SEC. 161. The head of each department is authorized to prescribe regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the government of his department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property appertaining to it.

Now, Mr. President, that provision brought into this bill by reference in that way gives the head of this department absolute and unlimited power to determine just what shall be done by him in carrying out the purposes of the bill, unless it be in violation of law. Therefore I say that except as to the restraints of the law that are thrown about every public official the power of the head of this department will be absolutely unlimited. When we come to consider the bill itself we find that its provisions are equally broad and unlimited in their terms.

Section 3 of the bill provides—

That it be the province and duty of the department of health to foster and promote all matters pertaining to the conservation and improvement of the public health and to collect and disseminate information relating thereto.

Language could hardly be broader and more unlimited than that. It gives him absolute power to control the situation—

Provided, That this act shall not be construed as attempting to authorize the department of health to exercise, or attempt to exercise, without express invitation from the chief executive or other proper authority of the State, any function belonging exclusively to such State, or to enter any premises in any State without the consent of the owner or occupant thereof.

I desire to call the particular attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to that language. It has been stated here that the purpose was to prevent the entrance into any family or any home under the provisions of this bill. But the Senator from Oklahoma will see that this provision in the bill only applies to residents of the States and does not limit the power in the slightest degree on the part of the head of this department or of any of his officers or employees to enter the home of any family in territory under Federal jurisdiction—for example, in the District of Columbia—at his will. There is no restraint whatever upon him.

I think you will find that right here in the city of Washington there are hundreds of Christian Scientists who do not believe in the administration of drugs as a remedy. They do not believe in the practice as it is carried on by regular physicians, and they would dislike exceedingly to have their homes entered for any such purpose as that; and yet under this bill as it is drawn that power does exist, and there is no limitation of the power.

Now, I come to that clause in the bill that was referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma awhile ago with respect to the attempt in the bill to prevent any interference with the practice of healing on the part of any other than the regular schools of medicine. I think the Senator from Oklahoma has overestimated the effect of that clause in the bill. It does not provide in terms or in any other way that there shall be no discrimination between different schools of medicine or different methods of healing. It simply provides that the department of health shall recognize no so-called school or system of medicine. I do not know exactly what the Senator understands by the use of the word "recognized." According to that there could be no recognition of any school of medicine. But it does exclude everybody else except those of schools of medicine, as the Senator will see. Whether that was his intention or not, I do not know. But certainly it does, as in case of almost every piece of legislation that is attempted to be passed in Congress or elsewhere, absolutely exclude Christian Scientists from any protection by the provisions of the bill.

Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire now to ask any questions in respect to it? I declined to be interrupted before. I meant no discourtesy to the Senator, as I think he will understand.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I started to interrupt the Senator when he was making his argument, but, feeling that it would, perhaps, interfere with the coherency of his presentation, I did not do so.

The bill was drawn deliberately and intentionally to prevent any discrimination against Christian Science, osteopathy, or any other school of medicine or of healing; and I thought the Senator, when he was criticizing the bill as establishing a department of medicine in control of one school or another school, had possibly overlooked the language of section 3. For that reason I asked him whether or not he understood that the bill intended to discriminate in favor of one school or another school or to recognize one school or another school.

Mr. WORKS. I may say to the Senator with respect to that matter that I do not believe the bill was intended on its face, or does upon its face, discriminate in favor of any school of medicine. But I desire to show, and will now proceed to do so, that such would be the effect of it, whether it is the intention of the Senator from Oklahoma in this bill to bring about that result or not. For this simple reason: Taking the medical bureaus as they exist at this time, you will be unable to find in any single one of them any medical practitioner who is not of the regular school of medicine.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator, if it will not interrupt him, whether or not this bill can be perfected by the use of any words whatever so as to accomplish the purpose of safeguarding the public health without promoting any particular school of medicine or so as to avoid the objection he makes.

Mr. WORKS. Well, I think that is very doubtful. It might be possible. The trouble about it is, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma, that you must have a head to an organization of this sort. It may be of the regular school; it may be of the homeopathic school; whatever the head of the bureau or department may be, he is entitled to make such regulations as he pleases with respect to the conduct of the bureau or department. Now, if he makes such rules and regulations as will exclude all but one school of medicine, what can be done by legislation to prevent that result?

It does not make any difference whether it is of the regular school or some other school. I have just as much objection to the domination of a Government organization of this kind by one school of medicine as another. I would have just as much objection, and it would be just as objectionable, however I may feel with respect to that matter, to have it dominated and controlled by Christian Scientists, even if I believed that that would be better for the people of this country, because I think it is unjust. But how we are going to have any legislation of this kind without placing in the head of the department the control of all these things I am unable to see.

Now, if the Senator from Oklahoma is skillful enough to provide a law that will avoid any such thing as that, it would remove many of the objectionable features of the bill, I am frank to say to him.

ALL BUT ONE SCHOOL OF MEDICINE EXCLUDED.

In order to verify what I have said with respect to the physicians and surgeons now in the employ of the Government, I desire to insert as a part of my remarks letters and memoranda which I have received from the different departments of the Government having to do with the medical branch of the service. First is a letter from the Superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane, in which he gives the number of the medical employees, and in which he states in terms:

I may say that all of the physicians in the hospital are of the regular school.

The letter and accompanying memorandum are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE,
Washington, D. C., May 8, 1911.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 6th instant making certain inquiries in regard to the number of people employed in this hospital in the care of the insane. In reply I inclose a tabulated statement which was gotten up in March, 1910, for the information of Senator OWEN, who then had a bill before the Senate for the establishment of a department of health, and who requested the different departments to give this sort of information. This table is approximately true at the present time. I may say that all of the physicians in the hospital are of the regular school.

I shall be very glad to give you any additional information you may desire.

Respectfully, WM. A. WHITE, Superintendent.

There are in the employ of the Medical Department of the Army—

Regular medical officers	384
Medical Reserve Corps officers	135
Contract surgeons	14
	533

All of these are graduates of the regular school.

GEO. H. TORNEY,
Surgeon General United States Army.

Then, from the Secretary of the Navy, who says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 9, 1911.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of the 6th instant reached me yesterday and, in reply, I write to inform you that there are at present 304 members of the regular Medical Corps of the Navy and 6 acting assistant surgeons appointed for temporary service. I regret that it is impracticable to inform you as to the number of representatives from the various schools of medicines, as this is not a matter of record.

Candidates for the Medical Corps are required to pass satisfactorily a practical examination in the usual branches of medicine and surgery, and they must also have a good, general preliminary education.

Faithfully, yours,

GEO. VON L. MEYER.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. OWEN rose.

Mr. WORKS. Just one moment. While the letter does not disclose the fact, I think I can say with perfect assurance that all of the medical employees in that department are like the others, of the regular school of medicine. Does the Senator from Oklahoma know of anything to the contrary?

Mr. OWEN. I simply rose to ask the Senator whether he thought those who are employed in the Army and Navy should not have taken such courses of instruction as are available in the country, and if it is to be regarded as a discredit that they should have graduated in such schools of medicine as we have in this country?

Mr. WORKS. Not in the least. I am not criticizing them because they have been graduated from any school of medicine. I am not criticizing in the least their competency or efficiency in the service. It is not that. It may be, and I presume it is, a fact that the surgeons and assistant surgeons and various medical employees are perfectly efficient in the service to which they belong. I am not intending to criticize them. I am simply calling attention to the fact that all of them are of a particular school of medicine, whether good or bad, and therefore the natural result of organizing a department of this kind would be to bring about exactly the same result with respect to the employees under that department.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that all of the employees of the Government at present engaged would come within the scope of his criticism?

Mr. WORKS. I desire to say, and I think I said awhile ago, and I do not think the Senator from Oklahoma could have misunderstood me, that my remarks are not intended in any sense to be a criticism.

Mr. OWEN. Well, then, subject to the comment of the Senator that they are graduates of regular schools.

Mr. WORKS. That is no discredit to them, I will say to the Senator. I am not pressing it as in any way discreditable to them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know whether a graduate of the homeopathic school could be to-day employed in the Navy or the Army of the United States? In other words, are the requirements of the Army and Navy such that a graduate of that particular school can enter either branch? Does the Senator know?

Mr. WORKS. I do not.

Mr. OWEN. I would respond to that by saying that regardless of whether a man is a graduate or not, as I understand the practice of the service, it is to subject the individual to a personal examination as to the extent of his knowledge to determine whether or not he is fitted by his training to serve the public in this way.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, just a moment. If that examination were made by a board of examiners consisting alone of regular physicians, I apprehend that nobody could pass the examination except one who could qualify as a regular physician.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I was going to suggest.

Mr. WORKS. That I understood to be the condition, but when the Senator from Utah asks me whether I know that to be so, I do not.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from California that the character of the examination could be easily framed so that the examination is by number, without disclosing the identity of the applicant at all; and that ought to be the rule in making the examinations.

Mr. WORKS. I do not know that that would help the situation, but I understand that is not so at the present time.

Mr. OWEN. I do not know whether it is true or not at the present time. Who does assert that it is not true?

Mr. WORKS. I do not. I say I do not know that it is true at the present time.

Mr. OWEN. Does anyone assert it is not true?

Mr. WORKS. No, sir. I do not profess to know anything about it. If I were asked my opinion about it, I would say that my opinion is that nothing of that kind exists; but I do not know it.

Mr. President, in closing I want to call attention to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of American School of Magnetic Healing against McAnnulty, in which the question rose as to the right of the Postmaster General to exclude from the mails certain advertisements by one who was claiming to be a magnetic healer and advertising his business. The question arose whether the Postmaster General had any right to determine that question, and whether he could on his own belief of what was right or what was wrong with respect to the healing of disease say that this thing or that thing should be excluded from the mails as fraudulent and in violation of law.

I am not saying this because I believe in the mode of healing that is carried on by magnetic healers, for I do not; but their rights are just like those of any American citizen so long as they are not violating the law in any way; and the principle upon which the Supreme Court acted in that matter is quite important as bearing upon the powers that might be given to the head of this department.

The Supreme Court say, on pages 103 to 106 of volume 187 of the United States Supreme Court decisions:

> There can be no doubt that the influence of the mind upon the physical condition of the body is very powerful, not only to alleviate but even to aid very largely in the cure of an illness from which the body may suffer. And it is said that nature may itself frequently, if not generally, heal the ills of the body without recourse to medicine, and that it can not be doubted that in numerous cases nature, when left to itself, does succeed in curing many bodily ills. How far these claims are borne out by actual experience may be matter of opinion. Just exactly to what extent the mental condition affects the body no one can accurately and definitely say. One person may believe it of far greater efficacy than another, but surely it can not be said that it is a fraud for one person to contend that the mind has an effect upon the body and its physical condition greater than even a vast majority of intelligent people might be willing to admit or believe. Even intelligent people may, and indeed do, differ among themselves as to the extent of this mental effect. Because the complainants might or did claim to be able to effect cures by reason of working upon and affecting the mental powers of the individual and directing them toward the accomplishment of a cure of the disease under which he might be suffering, who can say that it is a fraud or a false pretense or promise within the meaning of these statutes? How can anyone lay down the limit and say beyond that there are fraud and false pretenses? The claim of the ability to cure may be vastly greater than most men would be ready to admit, and yet those who might deny the existence or virtue of the remedy would only differ in opinion from those who assert it. * * *
> Suppose a person should assert that by the use of electricity alone he could treat diseases as efficaciously and successfully as the same have heretofore been treated by "regular" physicians. Would these statutes justify the Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to him, to adjudge such claim to be without foundation, and then to pronounce the person so claiming to be guilty of procuring by false or fraudulent pretenses the moneys of people sending him money through the mails, and then to prohibit the delivery of any letters to him? The moderate application of electricity, it is strongly maintained, has great effect upon the human system, and just how far it may cure or mitigate diseases no one can tell with certainty. It is still in an empirical stage, and enthusiastic believers in it may regard it as entitled to a very high position in therapeutics, while many others may think it absolutely without value or potency in the cure of disease. Was this kind of question intended to be submitted for decision to a Postmaster General? And was it intended that he might decide the claim to be a fraud, and enjoin the delivery of letters through the mail addressed to the person practicing such treatment of disease? As the effectiveness of almost any particular method of treatment of disease is, to a more or less extent, a fruitful source of difference of opinion, even though the great majority may be of one way of thinking, the efficacy of any special method is certainly not a matter for the decision of the Postmaster General within these statutes relative to fraud.
> Vaccination is believed by many to be a preventive of smallpox, while others regard it as unavailing for that purpose. Under these statutes, could the Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to him, decide that it was not a preventive, and exclude from the mails all letters to one who practiced it and advertised it as a method of prevention, on the ground that the moneys he received through the mails were procured by false pretenses?
> Again, there are many persons who do not believe in the homeopathic school of medicine, and who think that such doctrine, if practiced precisely upon the lines set forth by its originator, is absolutely inefficacious in the treatment of diseases. Are homeopathic physicians subject to be proceeded against under these statutes and liable at the discretion of the Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to him, to be found guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses and their letters stamped as fraudulent and the money contained therein as payment for their professional services sent back to the writers of the letters? And, turning the question around, can physicians of what is called the "old school" be thus proceeded against? Both of these different schools of medicine have their followers, and many who believe in the one will pronounce the other wholly devoid of merit. But there is no precise standard by which to measure the claims of either, for people do recover who are treated according to the one or the other school. And so, it is said, do people recover who are treated under this mental theory? By reason of it? That can not be averred as matter of fact. Many think they do. Others are of the contrary opinion. Is the Postmaster General to decide the question under these statutes?

I ask, if that be true, if the head of this department can determine that question in favor of one school of medicine to the exclusion of the other?

Mr. OWEN. I did not quite catch the force of the decision. It was to the effect that the Postmaster General could not discriminate against the magnetic healers. Would not that rule protect others from like discriminations——

Mr. WORKS. Not at all.

Mr. OWEN. Who occupied a similar position?

Mr. WORKS. It would so far as the use of the mails is concerned, but if a department of health——

Mr. OWEN. The spirit of the decision is to protect the individual in the practice of medicine.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly. I have said that if the head of the department goes so far as to violate the law he is subject to the law in that respect; but so long as he keeps himself within the law there is absolutely no limit to his power.

Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say on this subject. I have tried to discuss it with fairness and without any hostility toward anybody of any school of medicine or healing. I have no animosity or antipathy toward any school of medicine or anyone who is engaged in the practice of medicine. I recognize the fact that all schools of medicine are doing good at the present time in this country, and their rights should be fully respected. On the other hand, the mode of healing in which I believe is entitled to the same degree of justice as those who are practicing other means of healing disease.

Senators may not agree with me as to the efficacy of that sort of treatment. I am quite sure many of them do not. But that is not the question. If I believe in it I have a perfect right under the laws of this country to secure for myself such medical or other treatment as I desire, and it would be a violation not only of my rights, generally speaking, but it would be a violation of the very spirit of the Constitution to forbid me the right to resort to that sort of help that I believe to be most efficient in my own case. I would not have anyone denied the right which belongs to him in the use of drugs. That is his right, whether I believe in it or not; but I insist, on the other hand, that those of us who believe in another and different sort of remedy for our ills have exactly the same right to resort to that remedy that the man has who believes in the use of drugs as a remedy.

Mr. OWEN. Before the Senator takes his seat, there are one or two questions I would like to ask him, if it would be agreeable to him.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator understand that a national department of health would engage in the issuance of licenses to practitioners and deny licenses to Christian Science practitioners?

Mr. WORKS. I do not know whether they would or not. They could make regulations under your bill.

Mr. OWEN. That might be directly averted by forbidding it, but the practice of the United States, under the limitations of constitutional law, is that all licenses to practice "healing" or "medicine" are given by the State laws and not by the Federal Government. I think perhaps the Senator may have overlooked that. I do not think the Federal Government has any right whatever to issue licenses within a State for the practice of medicine.

Mr. WORKS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I think there is no constitutional right to do it.

Mr. WORKS. I agree with the Senator in respect to the exercise of that power in the States. That matter I have not discussed. I may discuss it at some future time if it becomes necessary. I have not undertaken to discuss the general principles involved or the constitutionality of the bill. I agree to what the Senator says, that the Federal department would have no right to interfere with the affairs of a State. But I have this to say, that the indications are, from what is said by some of these doctors, that they believe just that can be done, because one of them, as I remember, distinctly referred to the fact that they might elevate the efficiency of the State boards of health and various other things. That would be an interference with the constitutional rights of the States.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator has spoken, Mr. President, of the value of Christian Science. I myself believe it has been very efficacious in many instances. What the process is by which recovery is accomplished I do not think is thoroughly understood. But I should like to ask the Senator, in view of his confidence in its value, would it not be well to have the health officials we now have in Nation and in State give a proper study to it, with a view to ascertaining its value and giving it to the public when they have found its value?

Mr. WORKS. If the doctors, surgeons, and others who have charge of the medical bureaus of the Government would go about an examination of a matter of that kind in a right spirit, as I think the Senator from Oklahoma would, I believe it would be a very excellent thing to do. If they should go about it in the frame of mind which generally exists upon the part of medical practitioners, it would be useless.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I understood from the general discussion of the Senator from California that he was under the impression that Senate bill 6049 had been prepared by the American Medical Association.

Mr. WORKS. No; I think the Senator got that impression from something I read to the effect that their legislative committee would frame a bill. I said nothing about it. I know nothing about it.

Mr. OWEN. The bill which was introduced to establish a department of health at the last Congress was written by myself alone. I dictated every word of it.

Mr. WORKS. I did not controvert that in the least; I did not intend to do it.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator believe that under this bill the officers of the Federal department proposed could invade the private homes of citizens without the consent of the citizens?

Mr. WORKS. Yes; except in the States.

Mr. OWEN. Except in the States. That objection, then, might be easily obviated by inserting "the District of Columbia and the Territories" in the face of Senate bill No. 1.

Mr. WORKS. That could be easily obviated.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask the Senator from California a question. I am impressed with his discussion of this subject. Does the Senator believe that the law now upon the statute book is adequate, or would he suggest some change in the law under which we have now a bureau known as the bureau of health? I merely wish the Senator's view on that point.

Mr. WORKS. I believe everything that is desired to be accomplished through this bill, except the establishment of a department and the making of the head of that department a member of the Cabinet, could be accomplished by legislation with respect to the medical bureau as it exists at the present time without the establishment of a department.

Mr. SMOOT. And at a great deal less expense.

Mr. WORKS. And at a great deal less expense.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that Great Britain, Germany, France, and other leading nations of the world have departments of health?

Mr. WORKS. I am not informed, Mr. President, whether they have or not, and I should not care whether they have or not. They have not our Constitution or our form of government, which, I think, makes a great difference.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest to the Senator that the people who inhabit those countries have the same kind of bodies and die in the same kind of fashion, and may be protected from exposure in the same improved methods.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; and if permitted to do so, they would probably desire the same freedom we receive for those bodies and their treatment that I am contending for.

Mr. OWEN. I respond to that by saying that the people of Australia and New Zealand have the same degree of freedom we have, and in those countries the death rate under a better administration of government is only nine and a half to the thousand, whilst ours is sixteen and a half to the thousand. We lose over 600,000 people a year unnecessarily in this country by preventable causes.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator attribute that to the health department as it is there constituted?

Mr. OWEN. I do; and to the care of the people by the laws as administered in those countries.

Mr. WORKS. Then the Senator must intend to reflect on the department as we have it now, not only the Federal department but the boards of health in the several States. I think myself that they are fairly efficient.

Mr. OWEN. I do say that they are not everywhere as efficient as they ought to be. They ought to be made more efficient, and that is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. WORKS. Then the Senator proposes to make State boards of health more efficient through the Federal department. That is just the thing I object to.

Mr. OWEN. Only in so far as a good example and publicity of ascertained fact might be of service. I will say that some of the States have departments which are excellently well conducted that might well serve as an example and pattern for the United States, that the good example of the one will serve a valuable purpose in impressing the other, and that a reasonable mutual emulation on the part of the departments of health in the various States and in the Federal Government would serve a useful purpose in promoting a knowledge of the laws of health and protecting men against unnecessary death and from the inefficiency of unnecessary and avoidable disease, the annual present cost of which has been demonstrated to be about four thousand millions of dollars.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to trespass for only a few moments upon the time of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], who has given notice that he will address the Senate to-day.

Yesterday, in a colloquy with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], the attitude of the German Government with reference to agriculture and the tariff was referred to. I was unable at that time to turn to some data which I had, but which I now have before me, and desire to put into the RECORD in connection with that statement.

In 1879 Mr. Bismarck said in debate in the Reichstag:

Is not the moment approaching when our agriculture will no longer be able to exist because corn is pressed down to a price at which it can not be remuneratively produced in Germany, taxation, the cost of living, and the cost of land being as they are? When that moment comes, then not only agriculture but the Prussian State and the German Empire will go to ruin as well.

That marked the beginning of the change of policy of Mr. Bismarck with reference to duties upon farm products, and from that time he became an advocate of the protective policy in Germany and applied it equally to farm products with other articles.

Now, I read from a statement of Mr. James J. Hill, found in his book on Highways of Progress. Among other things therein discussed is the question of reciprocity:

How to meet German competition is to-day the study of every intelligent leader of industry and every cabinet on the Continent of Europe. It will be found that a large share of her world-wide success is due to symmetrical national development. Agricultural industry has not been slighted. Behold a contrast that throws light upon the idle host of England's unemployed marching despondently through streets whose shop windows are crowded with wares of German make. Between 1875 and 1900 in Great Britain 2,691,428 acres which were under cereals and 755,255 acres which were under green crops went out of cultivation. In Germany, during the same period, the cultivated area grew from 22,840,950 to 23,971,573 hectares, an increase of 5 per cent.

I also read in this connection a statement from the English tariff commission of 1906:

The causes of the decline in agriculture are world-wide in their operation, affecting all importing countries. The striking feature in the case of the United Kingdom is that agriculture has been more depressed than in any other country and more depressed than any other branch of economic activity. During the last 25 years the course of all agricultural prices has been the same downward direction, with the result that agriculture has been subject to a great combination of causes, all tending toward its depression.

The commission then proceeds:

European countries generally have pursued a policy involving import duties on agricultural produce, whereas in the United Kingdom agriculturists have been subject to the unrestricted importation of foreign produce on terms not dissimilar, in many cases, from those experienced by manufacturers who complain of dumping.

In this connection I call attention to another list of figures bearing upon that subject, it seems to me, if not directly, indirectly. In the great West, where the wheat acreage was once an average of 25 bushels per acre, it is now 14. The average wheat production of 40 different counties of northern Illinois is as follows: 1870, 10,476,011 bushels; in 1880, 7,122,963 bushels; in 1890, 5,073,070 bushels; in 1900, 637,450.

The average acreage in Indiana fell from 15.6 bushels to 14.4; Minnesota, 15.8 to 13; North Dakota, 14.4 to 10; the entire United States, 15.3 to 14.

The last available statistics show that our average wheat yield per acre is 13.5; Austria, 17; France, 19.8; Germany, 27.6; Great Britain, 32.2. Oats: United States, 30 bushels per acre; Germany, 46; Great Britain, 42. Barley: United States, 25; Germany, 33; Great Britain, 34.6.

I will not now trespass upon the time of the Senator from North Dakota to follow the statistics to show that the increase of production per acre in those countries began with the period of time when the countries began to give particular attention to their agricultural interests, either by way of increased duties upon imports or otherwise, and that the increase in production has steadily kept apace with the attention given to the matter by the Governments in different ways.

As I said yesterday, we have in this country one-half of our agricultural lands in private ownership not yet under cultivation. The last seven years have marked a noted increase in taking possession of the abandoned farms, the reclaiming of the land which was skinned over and from which the parties passed on to richer lands of the West between 1870 and 1890.

Not only have we the lands in private ownership, but we have, as I before stated, some 75,000,000 acres of public land which are agricultural lands, not including some ten or twelve million acres of swamp lands and perhaps five or seven million acres more of arid lands.

About 1870 there began the great immigration for the settlement of the agricultural lands of the West. The region was a vast one and easily reduced to cultivation. Transportation facilities were pushed in every direction.

From 1870 to 1900 we produced more agricultural products from this region alone than in all our history theretofore.

In 1860 there was under cultivation west of the Mississippi twenty-six and a half million acres; in 1900, 194,000,000 acres—a gain of 186,000,000.

We are preparing to admit to the same market and practically under the same Government a region of territory equal in extent and equal in richness and productiveness to the territory I am now referring to.

Between 1870 and 1890 we raised as much corn in the Mississippi Valley as had been produced in the United States up to 1870. Of wheat we produced one-half during that period of the total amount which had been produecd up to 1870.

From 1840 to 1870 our per capita production of the staple cereals was 860 bushels—from 1870 to 1900, 1,450 bushels—notwithstanding the fact that the agricultural population relative to the total population of the Nation was greater from 1840 to 1870 than it was from 1870 to 1900.

As a result these farm prices began to decline until they went down about one-half below the point where they had ranged before, the price of wheat falling fully one-half and corn and oats even below. The farmer could not sell. He burned his corn for fuel and his wheat rotted in the field.

Year after year the farmer's actual expenses exceeded the price of his productions, but he could not close up like a manufacturing establishment. This was his home and he had to stay with it.

In this impoverished condition the usurer found a harvest, and every cent of profit, when there was any, was divided with the railroad, the money lender, and the manufacturer. The farmer was ground to the earth for years in the great West, as everyone knows and as the mortgage record during that period discloses, which has only begun to be cleared up within the last 8 or 10 years.

The effect of all this was to drive the people from the farms into the cities and to discourage them from going to the farms at all. The city population in 1850 was 12½ per cent of the whole population of the United States; in 1900 it was nearly 50 per cent of the whole population.

In 1870 all towns and cities together contained a population of 11,750,000; in 1900 they contained a population of 35,840,000, an increase in 30 years of 24,900,000, showing that as the increase of population during this period was 37,745,000 the cities got nearly two-thirds of it. In fact, from 1890 to 1900 nearly three-fourths of the population went to the cities and towns. From 1870 to 1900 our population increased 88 per cent, and during that time our city population increased two and one-half times. And as the cities grew and the great skyscrapers went up in the centers of population there were more and more abandoned farms all through New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, because they were driven from the farm lands, where they could not secure a competency, into this region where the effect of the tariff system was more beneficial and where they could secure a living and possibly educate their families.

Of all people engaged in gainful pursuits in 1870, 47.36 per cent were engaged in agriculture; in 1880, 44.3 per cent; in 1890, 37.7 per cent; and in 1900, 35.7 per cent.

Farm values went down, and those prosperous agricultural regions of the East became the scene of abandoned farms. The farmer of the East skinned his farm and went West.

The increase in agricultural values during those years was small, but the increase in other values was exceedingly great, such as manufacturing establishments and city property. The average acreage value of farm lands from 1860 to 1900 only increased $4.70 per acre.

In 1850 the wealth of the agricultural classes was estimated at $3,987,000,000, of the town and city classes at $3,170,000,000, or at $1,000,000,000 in favor of the agricultural classes. From 1870 to 1880 the city wealth was $9,402,000,000; the agricultural wealth, $3,000,000,000. From 1880 to 1890 the increase of city wealth was $18,575,000,000; agricultural, $4,000,000,000. From 1890 to 1900 the increase of city wealth was $19,000,000,000; agricultural, $4,500,000,000. In other words, from 1860 to 1900 the total increase of wealth in the city was $59,811,000,000; the agricultural, $12,547,000,000.

The multimillionaires are not from the agricultural fields of industry.

I have trespassed longer than I should have done on the Senator's notice, but I wanted to put these figures into the RECORD in connection with what was said yesterday.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I will address the Senate upon the reciprocity bill, and especially upon the amendments pending to that bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, on January 26, 1911, President Taft transmitted to the two Houses of Congress a special message embodying the Canadian trade agreement which is now before this body. I made some remarks on this measure on the 28th of February, and expressed the opinion that it would work a great injury to the farmers of this country and would be of no benefit to the consumers in the cities, for the reason that they do not buy the natural products direct from the farmers, but buy the manufactured articles and the secondary food products on which the duties are retained. A further study of this question has not changed my views in this respect, and I may say that they are shared by the great majority of those most vitally interested in this matter—the farmers.

The farmers of this country are greatly concerned about the effects of this measure, and I venture to say that they are almost unanimous in their opposition to it. I know that that is the case in North Dakota and neighboring States. I believe it is true, as has been stated by representative men from agricultural districts, that never since the Civil War has the farmer been so aroused over any legislation as he is over this agreement. In many of the Western States they have held conventions to protest against it. In North Dakota, the State which I have the honor in part to represent, a nonpartisan State convention was held which more than 700 farmers and business men attended. The delegates to this convention were elected at conventions held in the different counties in the State by the farmers of the respective counties, and were expected to, and did, express the general view of the people of their respective sections with regard to this measure. This movement was not financed by anyone. The farmers attending the county conventions paid their own expenses and the delegates to the State convention paid their own expenses. At this convention the delegates, without regard to political party, were unanimous in denouncing this agreement, and a delegation was selected to come to Washington and urge the manifest injustice to the agricultural class of enacting such a measure as the one pending. This convention was not held because it was thought necessary to influence the attitude of the Senators and Congressmen from the State. They knew the position which their representatives had taken on this question. It was well known that the entire congressional delegation from the State would oppose the measure. The action was taken in the hope that the Senate and the Finance Committee would listen with open minds to the representations of the men whose market it was proposed to surrender to the Canadian farmers. They could not bring themselves to believe that Congress would willingly enact a measure the only apparent result of which would be to deprive the farmers of this country of hundreds of millions of dollars, for the benefit of the Canadian farmers and some of the trusts in our own country, if they only correctly understood the situation. Attempts have been made by part of the press, and others, to discredit the delegations of farmers that came to Washington to protest against this measure and to create the impression that they were sent here by the Lumber Trust and other protected interests. I protest against these gratuitous insults to the representatives of the most important industry in this country, the only explanation of which is a desire to discredit all opposition to this measure, and I merely state a fact when I say that the unfairness which certain large papers have shown in the treatment of this question has resulted in diminishing to a large extent the power and influence of the press as a whole.

Some people have been able to delude themselves with the belief that this measure is approved of by the country as a whole, and that the farmers are indifferent to it. Nothing could be further from the truth. Various commercial organizations, it is true, and in some few instances State legislatures, have passed resolutions favoring it, but as was shown before the Senate Finance Committee, it is also true that in many instances, if not in most of them, these favorable resolutions were adopted because they were pressed by some interested person, and the majority of the other members had little idea of the real nature of the agreement. Sometimes they were adopted without a single member of the body or organization having seen a copy of the bill. The indifference of the farmer is apparent only to those viewing his attitude with a prejudiced eye, or else incapable of understanding how the farmer records his opposition to measures. Because there have been no riots among the farmers in opposition to this measure, that is not a sign that the farmers are indifferent. The farmer of this country is not a rioting person. He has a habit of recording his approval or disapproval of the acts of his Congressman and Senator in another way, and it is probable that some of those so busily engaged in discovering that the farmers are indifferent to this matter will have occasion to change their views when the ballots are next counted.

Mr. President, this measure has come to us as the result of what has been variously called a treaty and an agreement with Canada. If a treaty had been negotiated, it should have been submitted to the Senate for ratification, and a two-thirds vote would have been necessary to put it into effect. This measure is not a treaty, however, but legislation designed to put into effect an agreement made by the President with the Government of Canada. Such agreements are usually embodied in formal treaties, but in this instance the President has taken it upon himself to make an agreement with a foreign nation, without consulting the Senate and without submitting the agreement to the Senate for ratification, as it was his duty to do under the Constitution, and has agreed as a part of the bargain with that foreign country to use his utmost efforts to secure the passage of laws putting that agreement into effect. The majority of the membership of this body seem to view this action on the part of the President with equanimity, whether they do not realize its real nature or else rely on the President's good sense not to enter into any agreement with foreign powers which would result disastrously to our country. There is no essential difference, however, between entering into an agreement of this kind and pledging himself to use all his efforts to secure the enactment of legislation carrying it into effect, and the entering into an agreement to aid some other power in the case of war and pledging himself to use his best efforts to secure the passage of bills appropriating the necessary moneys. I do not believe there is any danger that this will be done so long as the present incumbent of the presidential chair remains in the White House—notwithstanding the apprehensions of some people last spring—but if this precedent is established, if this invasion of the prerogatives of the Senate is countenanced, it will some time in the future return with evil results in its train, when some President whose penchant will be the extension of territorial dominion instead of the surrendering of the farmers' markets, will use the power of making agreements with foreign nations, which the Senate appears to be about to surrender to the President, in such a way as to involve our country in serious difficulties with other nations.

The bill which we have under consideration here is a revenue bill, and as such should have originated in the House of Representatives. In having the bill framed, so far as its essentials are concerned, and trying to force it through Congress, the President is exceeding his constitutional powers, and this violation assumes a decidedly serious aspect when we reflect that the action is being taken in accordance with a pledge given to a foreign nation. The Members of both Houses of Congress, as well as the people at large, have been in the habit of considering that the lawmaking power is lodged in Congress, and that the President has merely the veto power. We have assumed that when the Constitution stated this in plain words it meant just that. Now that this important measure is before us, however, a majority of the Members of the two Houses of Congress cheerfully acquiesce in the assumption of the President that he is the real lawmaking as well as the treaty-making body, and that the Congress has merely the veto power and that even this veto power should not be exercised free from pressure by the administration. The President, after having consulted representatives of a foreign country, has decided what measures ought to be passed by Congress, has had measures drafted, and is now under the pledge which he gave the Canadian Government, using all his power to secure the passage of the desired revenue legislation. The President has apparently come to the conclusion that he represents the people of this country both as executive and legislature, and that the two Houses of Congress are merely two bodies of men provided for by the Constitution, which he can unfortunately not get rid of, but which are to be ignored and coerced whenever he deems it necessary or expedient. I am not a lawyer and I shall not pursue this subject further—it has been touched on before and will no doubt be fully discussed before the close of this debate—but I confess that I can not view with the equanimity that others evince the usurpation of legislative power by the President, and the ignoring of the Senate in the making of agreements having the effect of treaties with foreign nations.

One noticeable feature of this debate, which has been remarked on by others, is the strange unwillingness of the supporters of this measure to explain what benefits the country will derive from it and to defend it and the President's action in entering into the agreement on the floor of the Senate. The result is that while there are a large number of Senators pointing out the defects of this measure and urging injurious results as reasons for defeating it or radically changing it, they have to carry on the debate without any presentation by the great majority of the supporters of the bill why they or anyone should be in favor of its passage. The supporters of the measure must surely have some reason for being in favor of it, and ought not to be averse to enlightening those of us who do not find that we can in good conscience support it. There have been no reasons presented to the Senate by the President or by those in charge of the bill why it should pass. It almost appears as though we are expected to accept the President's advice and pass whatever measures he may be pleased to submit to us without opposition and with only perfunctory debate.

The arguments advanced outside of this Chamber by friends of this agreement are various. It has been urged that it will tend to reduce the high cost of living, or at least prevent it from rising any higher; that it will benefit the farmer by giving him cheaper bran and shorts; that it will steady the wheat market in this country by preventing violent fluctuations at Liverpool due to the dumping of Canadian wheat into the Liverpool market, as this wheat will be absorbed by the storage facilities of the United States and more gradually shipped to Liverpool; that it will extend our markets; that it will promote commercial intercourse and increase our trade with Canada; that it will give us cheaper print paper; that it is a step toward free trade; and that it is the inauguration of a policy which will result in the annexation of Canada. Further, there is vague talk of the mutual benefits to be derived from closer trade relations with our neighbor on the north, without specifying what those benefits may be or showing how this agreement is going to bring them about.

The most superficial examination of this measure can not fail to impress on one's mind three facts in regard to it: The articles on which the duties are to be removed are practically all farm products or raw materials. The articles on which we reduce or remove the duties are the same ones on which Canada reduces or removes her duties. The farm products and raw materials from which the duties are removed are such as Canada expects to sell to us and not such as we might hope to sell to Canada. If we bear those facts in mind, it may aid us in determining what the purpose of the entering into this agreement was and what its probable effect will be.

The purpose of this bill is usually given as the promotion of commercial intercourse with Canada and the extension of our trade with that country. I do not believe anyone has as yet shown how it will increase our trade with Canada in any other way than by increasing our imports of agricultural products. Three considerations force themselves upon one in this connection: (1) If the purpose is to secure cheaper raw materials, the proper way is not to remove the duties only on Canadian products, but on the products of all countries. (2) If the purpose is to reduce the price of the commodities which the average consumer uses, the way to do this is to remove or greatly reduce the duties on the manufactured articles. (3) If the purpose is to extend our markets in Canada, the way to do this is not to secure the removal or the reduction of the Canadian duties on such goods only as Canada expects to sell to us, but to secure the removal of such duties on goods that we export to Canada or might expect to export to Canada if the duties were removed.

It appears to me that the truth of these statements ought to be clearly evident to anyone who will attempt to view the measure with unbiased eyes. If for some reason or other—if the producers of any product have formed a trust or combination so as to unduly enhance prices, or if our production falls short of our consumption, and the tariff on the product consequently results in higher prices, and we wish to reduce these prices by removing the tariff, it seems self-evident that the effective way to do this is to remove the tariff on the goods of all foreign countries and not only on the goods of one. Otherwise, we simply give the producer in the favored foreign country the benefit of our protection—letting him share our home market—in short, give him a measure of protection against the producers in other foreign countries. If the wheat growers of this country have formed a trust and raised the price of wheat beyond what it ought to be, or if our production falls short of our consumption so that the tariff on wheat results in increased prices, and we decide to reduce the price by admitting foreign wheat, the proper way to do, if we have no other purpose in mind, is to remove the duty on wheat, no matter from what country or part of the world it comes. If we admit wheat from one country and exclude that from other countries, we are giving protection to the producers of the first country. The same necessarily holds true in the case of flax, of barley, of oats, of cattle, of pulp and paper, and of any other product. The only ground on which the admission of certain articles free from one country and not from another can be defended is that by so doing we receive in return some advantage from the former country that we do not from the latter. If Canada has given us any such advantages in the pending agreement, no one seems willing or able to point them out.

If the purpose is to reduce the price of the articles that the average consumer uses, not only should the duties be removed on articles from all countries instead of merely from one, but the duties to be removed or greatly reduced should be those on the articles which the consumer buys—not the duties on the natural products, but the goods manufactured from them. So long as the duty remains on the manufactured article, it makes no difference to the consumer whether there is a duty on the raw material. If the price of wheat falls off 10 cents a bushel because of this agreement it will not affect the price of flour or of the bread made from the flour. If the price of flax is reduced 25 cents per bushel by the removal of the duty, it will not affect the price of linseed oil. Even if the price of oats tumbles on account of the duty being taken off, the price of rolled oats will remain the same so long as the duty is not removed from that. If the price of cattle is reduced the full amount of the present duty the price of beef will remain the same so long as the Beef Trust is protected in its market. Whatever reduction there may be in the price of wheat, of oats, of barley, of flax, or of any of the other farm products and raw materials that this measure places on the free list, the consumer will not get the benefit of lower prices on articles manufactured from these.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from North Dakota has expressed the view that if you remove the duty on wheat and retain the duty on flour the flour will not be reduced in price to the consumer.

Mr. GRONNA. That is my position.

Mr. STONE. And that if you remove the duty on cattle and let the duty on beef remain it will not reduce the cost of meat to the consumer.

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct.

Mr. STONE. I wish now to ask whether the Senator thinks that the removal of the duty on flour as well as the duty on wheat would be helpful or hurtful to the wheat raiser; and also to ask him whether he thinks that if we take the duty off cattle so that they may come in free from Canada or free from all the world, and then take the duty off meats so as to let meat come in free, would the effect be to increase or decrease the price of live cattle?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri asked me two questions.

Mr. STONE. Confine it to the last.

Mr. GRONNA. I will attempt to answer both, briefly. The first question is, If we take the duty off, we will say, the raw material, the wheat, which is the product of the farmer, or from cattle, and also remove the duty from the secondary products, will that reduce the price to the consumer? To that I answer yes; I believe it will. The second question, if I understand the Senator correctly, is, If we take the duty off the raw material and retain it on the secondary products, will that reduce the price to the consumer? I say no; and I want to cite one instance, Mr. President, which is worth a great deal more than my opinion.

During the Sixty-first Congress we can all remember the interest that was taken by the Members in both branches of Congress in the question of hides. When the duty was taken off hides green salted hides were worth in the Chicago market from 16¾ to 18 cents per pound. It had been said that taking the duty off hides would not affect the price of hides, and it is true that it did not for a few months; it is true that during the next fall hides sold, if anything, a little higher in the Chicago market than they did before the duty was removed; but to-day the price of hides is from 10 to 13 cents a pound, and there is not a Senator on this floor nor a consumer in this Capital but knows that the price of shoes has been advanced to the consumer.

While I am not going to set up my own opinion, if I had time I could prove to the satisfaction of every Senator here that the price on all grades of shoes has advanced on an average about 10 per cent, and in some cases, on the higher grades, it has advanced 12½ per cent. Is that an answer to the Senator?

Mr. STONE. I fear I did not make myself understood by the Senator. I will ask this direct question——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I am afraid that he does not appreciate and understand the effect of the statement that was made to him by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. STONE. Oh, I think I do understand and appreciate it. As to the hide and shoe business, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly, I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I will say that during the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich bill I was opposed to putting hides on the free list unless we also put shoes on the free list.

Mr. GRONNA. In that the Senator from Missouri showed his usual good sense and judgment.

Mr. STONE. I advocated both; and if my distinguished friend from Minnesota would consider it of sufficient interest, which of course he will not and should not, to examine the RECORD of that time, he would find that I offered an amendment to put shoes on the free list, and that I voted against putting hides on the free list unless shoes were put on the free list. I never believed that putting hides on the free list would result in cheapening shoes to the consumers. I agree with the Senator from North Dakota that it has not done so. I can have no controversy with the Senator from North Dakota or the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] about that. It was very easy for me to appreciate the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota, to which the Senator from Minnesota has called my attention.

I wish to ask this direct question: Does the Senator from North Dakota favor putting meats on the free list?

Mr. GRONNA. Most assuredly, if we place cattle on the free list. If we allow the importation of cattle without any duty, I would certainly favor placing meats on the free list.

Mr. STONE. If this reciprocity bill is agreed to by the Senate as it passed the House, would the Senator from North Dakota vote to put meats on the free list for the whole world?

Mr. GRONNA. I would be willing to do more than that. I would be willing to pass the free-list bill first, as suggested by my distinguished friend and neighbor from Minnesota.

Mr. STONE. But I want, if the Senator will consent——

Mr. GRONNA. And then pass the woolen bill and then——

Mr. STONE. I am not asking about the free list. I am asking the Senator from North Dakota if he would vote to incorporate a provision in the law, in the event the reciprocity bill is passed, to put meats on the free list?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am a new Senator——

Mr. STONE. But you are an old Member of Congress.

Mr. GRONNA (continuing). And I have not been in position to get the information that perhaps other Senators have. I think it would be better to wait with all this kind of legislation until we get a report from the Tariff Commission. Then we would have full knowledge of conditions not only in our own country but in all countries, especially Mexico, as the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] suggests to me.

Mr. STONE. I understood the senior Senator from Iowa to argue the other day that it would be dangerous to put meat on the free list for the reason that if that were done the great packing establishments now operating in the United States might transfer their operations in large measure to the Argentine, to Mexico, and other foreign cattle-raising countries, and there purchase the cheaper range cattle raised on the plains of Argentina or Mexico, slaughter them there, employing cheaper labor, and so on and so forth, along the usual line of argument; and then he argued that they could ship that meat in here and dump it in our markets at a price below what meat made of American-raised cattle could be produced and sold for without a loss, and that the effect of that would be to still further depress the price of our native cattle in the hands of our farmers and feeders. If that is true, if the view of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who is a wise Senator and one who has delved deeply into the mysteries of these questions, is right, then is it not true, as contended by the Senator from Iowa, that the inevitable effect of permitting the introduction of free meat from the world at large would be to cheapen the price of native cattle, for the price of cattle must in a great measure depend upon the price of beef in our market places?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GRONNA. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. STONE. I was asking the Senator from North Dakota a question. I did not purpose to take the witness stand.

Mr. NELSON. Allow me to make a suggestion. What effect would all that the Senator from Missouri has described have on the packers of Kansas City? I wish the Senator would give us some light on that subject.

Mr. STONE. It would have the same effect on the packers of Kansas City that it would have upon the packers of any other city.

Mr. NELSON. Well, what would be the effect?

Mr. STONE. I was not undertaking to state effects. I was undertaking, for the benefit of my friend from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], who is insurging alongside of my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], to state the view, as I understand it, of the Senator from Iowa, and to ascertain whether they were agreed.

Now, of course, if cattle bought on the plains of Argentina at a lower price than they can be brought from the ranges of the United States or from the feed lots of the United States, and can be turned into beef down there at a lower price than the cattle here can be turned into beef, and can then be shipped at a comparatively small expense to our ports and from thence distributed, it does strike me that it would tend to decrease the price of beef to the consumer in the United States, and that in turn might reduce the price of cattle.

Mr. NELSON rose.

Mr. STONE. If you decrease the price of beef in the United States, it strikes me, as it does the Senator from Iowa, that it might decrease the price of cattle in the feed lot.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. STONE. I was asking the Senator from North Dakota if he thinks as the Senator from Iowa thinks about this, and I wanted to know if he was in favor of putting beef on the free list?

Mr. NELSON. I should like to know what remedy the Senator from Missouri would prescribe. Has he any specific that would cure such a situation as he describes?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from North Dakota answers the very discriminating inquiry propounded by the Senator from Missouri, I should like him to take my position from me rather than from the memory of our distinguished friend, the Senator from Missouri, although he is not far wrong.

Notwithstanding this alliance between the free-trade Senator from Missouri——

Mr. STONE. No; do not put it that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean the tariff-for-revenue-only Senator from Missouri and the high protectionists of New England and Pennsylvania and New York; I am still a protectionist. I still believe in the soundness and universality, for that matter, of the general doctrine of protection. It is said, and it may be true—I am not disposed to controvert it at this time—that there is no substantial difference between the cost of producing cattle in Canada and in the United States.

If there is no such difference, then under the doctrine of protection there ought to be no duty on cattle imported from Canada into the United States. I am not saying whether there is or is not a difference, because we have not made the investigation which is necessary to reach a certain conclusion upon the subject. But——

Mr. STONE. But the Tariff Board has.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Tariff Board has reported some facts with regard to the business, but has not made that complete return which we have a right to expect and which we can fairly expect in the near future. But if the cattle raised in Canada come in free to the United States it goes without saying—no one ought to controvert the proposition—that the meat made from those cattle shall come into the United States free. The man who would deny that proposition has lost all his power of reasoning.

Now, so far as South America is concerned, I want the Senator from Missouri to remember that the conditions of cattle raising in, say, the Argentine Republic are widely different from the conditions of cattle raising in the United States, and everyone who knows anything about that knows that it costs less to produce a steer in the Argentine than it does in the United States.

If we should open the markets of this country to either the cattle or the meat of the Argentine Republic and surrounding countries, we would only be intensifying and emphasizing the wrong that we are about to perpetrate upon the farmers of this country in the reciprocity measure, and so I do not want to be misunderstood at all. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to free meat from the Argentine Republic. I am opposed to it because that policy would still further reduce the price of cattle in the United States. But I am in favor of free meat from Canada because we are apparently about to admit cattle from Canada upon the hypothesis that it costs no more to produce cattle here than it does there. And with that statement of my position I turn the question and the subject over to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. STONE. I think I fairly stated the position of the Senator from Iowa and substantially as he has stated it himself. Now I again ask my friend the Senator from North Dakota if he concurs in the view of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Missouri puts to me a hypothetical question. I will ask the Senator from Missouri if he believes that the farmers of Missouri and the United States are receiving too high a price for their cattle or for their meat?

Mr. STONE. No; I do not think they are. I wish they were getting more. But that does not at all touch the question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall not undertake to make any answer for the distinguished Senator from Iowa. I wish I were as able to take care of myself as he is. I can not give the Senator from Missouri a direct answer, because, as I said before, we have had no report from the Tariff Commission that would justify me in saying that I would be in favor of letting in free meat from Mexico. I will say that I believe, as the Senator from Iowa has said, that it might be the means of reducing the price of cattle to the farmers of the United States.

The result of this measure will be that for every bushel of wheat imported the Government will lose the 25 cents which it would have collected otherwise, and for every bushel that the miller buys from the American farmer he will pay as much less as the price is reduced by the free importation of Canadian wheat. For every bushel of barley imported the Government will lose the 30-cent duty, and that bushel will aid the brewing interests in getting the barley of the American farmer for a less price. For every bushel of flax imported the Government will fail to collect the present duty of 25 cents per bushel, and the linseed oil trust will pay less to the American farmer for every bushel of flax that it buys from him. The trusts are still protected in their markets; it is the farmers who are to receive less for their products in order that this administration may have the glory of being the one to negotiate a trade agreement with Canada and force its ratification by Congress.

As an illustration of what result may be expected from removing the duties on raw materials while retaining them on the products manufactured from them, I wish to remind you of what happened when the duty was removed from hides. I touched upon that a moment ago.

Those of us who were in Congress at that time remember the plea of the shoe manufacturers and the tanners for free hides. According to them, if free hides were given them, the result would be lower prices for shoes. Hides were after a struggle placed on the free list, but the price of shoes went up and has stayed up. It has been stated that this was due to an increase of the price of hides—in spite of the removal of the duty—caused by an increased demand for hides in other countries. The fact is, however, that the price of hides has dropped.

In June, 1909, the Chicago prices of hides ranged from 13¾ to 17 cents per pound, on the various kinds of hides; in October of the same year they ranged from 14½ to 18 cents, but since then there has been a steady decline, and in March of this year the prices ranged from 10 to 13 cents. The prices of hides have decreased, but the prices of shoes have increased. Whether the benefit of the cheaper hides went to the tanners, the shoe manufacturers, or the trust controlling the machines used by shoe manufacturers, or whether they all shared in it, the fact can not be disputed that the consumer—the person who buys the shoes—not only did not receive any benefit from the removal of the duty on hides, but actually has to pay a higher price for his shoes than he did before. And the Government lost $2,000,000 revenue, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] suggests.

If the purpose of this agreement is to extend the commerce of the United States, or if that is one of the purposes, it would seem that it must have been entered into blindly on the part of our Representatives. Almost without exception the goods on which the duties have been removed are goods that Canada will sell to us and that we can have no hopes of selling to her. I do not see how anyone can maintain that there is any reciprocity in such an agreement. I do not assent to the proposition that the mere mutual removal of duties by two countries constitutes reciprocity. Unless there are mutual benefits there is no reciprocity. It is beyond my comprehension how we can have reciprocity with Canada unless Canada removes the duties from goods that we expect to sell to her in return for our removing the duties on goods which she expects to sell to us.

Mr. President, never before would a measure of this kind have been seriously considered by a Republican President or a Republican Senate. It is not a reciprocity agreement in the true sense of the word, either in form or in nature. It is merely a cloak to hide the adoption of a new economic and industrial policy—a policy that no one connected with the administration has as yet dared to champion in the open, a policy that has never yet been accepted as a Republican policy by anyone authorized to speak for the party and that has never yet found its way into a Republican platform, a policy out of harmony with all the previous declarations of the Republican Party and directly opposed to the tenets held by those who composed its galaxy of statesmen, a policy which will be repudiated by the rank and file of the party as soon as they have an opportunity to be heard—the policy of placing food products and raw materials on the free list and retaining a protective duty on manufactures.

I feel called upon to protest against this false and pernicious doctrine. It is not in accordance with Republican platform declarations. It was part of the platform on which Mr. Foss was elected governor of Massachusetts, but that was not a Republican platform. Those who favor it must proceed on the assumption that there is no difference in the cost of producing the raw material in the different countries and that its producer is so favorably situated that there is no need of considering what his requirements may be. The only alternative is the less charitable assumption, although I will not say less true in some cases, that those who are so ready to remove the duties on the raw material while advocating the retention of the duties on manufactures—often far in excess of the difference in cost of production at home and abroad—care nothing for any other industries so long as those in which they are especially interested are properly protected. The plea that the farmer has derived no direct benefit from the protective duties on his products in the past, and should therefore not complain if those duties are now removed when it is admitted that he is deriving some benefit or will derive some in the near future, is neither a justification nor an excuse. It is merely an attempt to find a plausible explanation of their willingness to sacrifice the interests of the farmer and producer of raw materials.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think my colleague will agree with me that the use of the term "raw material" as applied to farm products is rather a misnomer. We can scarcely say a product that comes first from an investment of land at $50 to $100 an acre, the turning of that land over by the use of power, either horsepower or otherwise, of harrowing it, of purchasing or raising the seed, of sowing it, of caring for that seed, of then harvesting and shocking and thrashing, and finally cleaning and hauling to market is a raw material, and therefore it is the farmers' manufactured material, entitled to the same consideration as any other manufactured product, and should be considered the same in the matter of the levying of our tariff.

Mr. GRONNA. My colleague is absolutely correct in that. I am only using the term "raw material" here in the usual, perhaps rather loose, way. The farmer's bushel of wheat is his finished product; the farmer's wool is his finished product; and everything that is produced on his farm is as much his finished product as a pair of boots is the manufacturer's finished product. There is no question about that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. WARREN. The suggestion in my mind has been given voice by the senior Senator from North Dakota. I assume, and I think correctly, that the junior Senator from North Dakota was using the term in the loose way it is often used. But when we undertake to trace a really true raw material I find it is a good deal of a will-o'-the-wisp, because, taking the matter of farmers' products, they are all the result of an investment of time, labor, and capital. Take, for instance, wool. As stated, that is the finished product of the farmer. It goes to the spinner, and while wool is his raw material the yarn that he turns out is his—the spinner's—finished product. It goes still further to the weaver, the cloth men. The yarn is their raw material in the same sense. The cloth is their manufactured product. Again, it goes to the cutters and the makers of garments. The cloth itself is their raw material and the finished clothing is their manufactured product.

So it is hard to undertake to define anything along the lines of that which is the product of labor as raw material. I assume that the Senator from North Dakota is using the term in the sense in which it is so often used or misused.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I think we can only justly apply the term raw material to the minerals in the ground, which have been placed there by nature, and the trees that grow on the mountains or along the rivers. The moment that human labor is applied to them even those articles become the fixed product of the laborer.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to thank my colleague and also the Senator from Wyoming for calling my attention to this point. I agree with both. What is one man's finished product is another man's raw material, and vice versa. As my colleague has said, raw material is that which has not been touched by the human hand.

The Republican platform of 1908 declares:

> In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

It does not confine it to manufactures, but to American industries.

This platform on which President Taft was elected does not mention reciprocity; neither does the Democratic platform of that year. If the principle above stated is to apply in the making of tariffs, the policy will have to be pursued as regards agriculture as well as manufacturing. If the manufacturer is to have a protective duty equal to the difference in cost of production, so must the farmer. The farmers have loyally supported protection because they believed that it would result in building up the industries of the country, and although most of them realized that they were getting comparatively little in return for the burden they were bearing, they bore the burden uncomplainingly, because they had sufficient patriotism to suffer under temporary—as they believed—disadvantages in order that the general welfare might be promoted. They did expect, however, fair treatment. Believing that it would be wise statesmanship to have a protective tariff sufficient to encourage home industries and protect the home market from the effects of industrial disturbances and undue price fluctuations abroad; believing that a reasonable stability in prices is more advantageous both to the producer and the consumer than violent fluctuations, and consequently believing that our own markets should not be subjected to the disturbances which would be inevitable if thrown open to the whole world so as to feel the combined effects of speculations, panics, misdirected efforts, industrial miscalculations, and in general whatever may disturb production and bring on industrial crises, they were willing to bear these burdens at a time when they derived little benefit from them, in the belief that when the time came when it would be a direct benefit to the farmers to protect them from the flood of produce resulting from the opening of new and fertile lands, that small favor would not be begrudged them. They now see with bitter amazement the readiness with which they are now to be sacrificed, not because of any undue benefits which they have been deriving from protection, not because of their having formed trusts and combinations to raise the prices of their products to exorbitant levels, but apparently because it has been decided that popular discontent with the indefensible duties on certain manufactures demands a victim to appease the popular discontent, and the agricultural interests have been seized upon as the ones who will make the least resistance. Consequently they are called upon to surrender the duties on their products without receiving anything in return, and their protection is to be cut off without any examination as to what the effect of such action will be, and so far as the administration is concerned, without giving the farmers a single word in defense. How different the treatment of the woolen interests, the duties on whose products the President has characterized as indefensible, but which, it is now given out, must not be touched until the Tariff Board has made a thorough investigation, lest a change based on deficient knowledge injure the industry!

I can not forbear to say at this point, Mr. President, that the indifference of the administration to the interests and welfare of the farmer, the unkindly rebuffs he has met with when he has attempted to present his case to the President, and the jeers and innuendos of which he has been made the object by the metropolitan press, especially that portion of it which is supporting the present administration, will not result in any good either for the country or the administration. I do not presume that there is a Senator here who does not know that the opposition to this measure among the farmers is real, and that the farmers who appeared before the Finance Committee of the Senate in opposition to it were here in sincere earnestness because they were convinced of the injustice of the measure and the destructive effects which it will have on agriculture.

This bill places whatever the farmer produces on the free list, and the arguments for it have largely been devoted to stating that this will not injure the farmer in any way, that it will not affect the prices that he receives for his products. Especially in the case of wheat it has been industriously reported that the price is made in Liverpool, and that, consequently, anything that we may do in this matter will have no effect on that price. It is noticeable that those who are industriously making this statement are those who have nothing more than an academic interest in the price of wheat or else have certain interests in the adoption of this measure. The farmer and the grain buyer both seem to be convinced that it will affect the price, and that its effect will be to lower the price. Without exception, so far as I have noticed, all those who have had to do with the handling of grain, whose success or failure has often depended on their ability to judge the market and determine its probable trend, whether it be as buyer or seller, seem to be convinced that the free admission of Canadian wheat can have but one effect, and that is to lower the price to the American farmer. Those who have to back their opinion with hard cash seem to be satisfied that the effect of removing the duty will be to lower the price. The very day that the Minneapolis wheat traders received the news of the Canadian agreement there was a break in the wheat prices at Minneapolis. In the market reports published by such papers as the Minneapolis Journal, which supports this agreement, this break was ascribed to the belief that the agreement would result in lower prices. Whether that belief be correct or erroneous, there is no getting around the fact that the break in the market and the subsequent lower prices for wheat were due to it.

There are those who, looking at our exports of wheat every year, are unable to comprehend why the removal of the tariff on wheat should have any effect on the price. Most people know that our consumption of wheat is gradually overtaking our production, and that our exports are consequently decreasing. The exports for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1908, 1909, and 1910, were 163,043,669 bushels, 114,268,468 bushels, and 87,364,318 bushels, respectively.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask my colleague if that does not include flour?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; it includes flour.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wished to make it clear.

Mr. GRONNA. This includes the wheat flour, reduced to bushels at the rate of 4½ bushels to the barrel. The exports for the calendar years 1908, 1909, and 1910 of wheat and wheat flour were 151,338,124 bushels, 92,085,643 bushels, and 61,923,297 bushels, respectively. The 1910 crop of wheat was 695,443,000 bushels. It will thus be seen that the export of wheat and flour during the calendar year 1910 was somewhat less than 9 per cent of the number of bushels raised that year. It would appear to many that this would be sufficient to have the effect of reducing the price in our markets to the level of the Liverpool market, less the cost of transporting the wheat to the latter market. One difficulty with most people in considering this question is that they do not distinguish between the different kinds and grades of wheat, and do not appreciate the different milling qualities of the various grades. Further, many people are apt to pursue the inquiry as to where the wheat goes no further when they learn that it was exported, taking it for granted that every bushel sold abroad has the same effect in tending to reduce the price in our domestic market to the Liverpool price as if sold in Liverpool.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, we exported in all 46,679,876 bushels of wheat. Of this about 20,000,000 bushels went to England. Almost 6,000,000 bushels went to Belgium. Over 5,000,000 bushels went to Germany. Over 3,000,000 bushels went to Mexico. During the same year we exported in all 9,040,987 barrels of flour. Of this, 1,895,397 barrels went to England, 791,850 barrels to Cuba, almost 740,000 barrels to the Netherlands, and almost 669,000 barrels to Hongkong. The rest of the flour and the rest of the wheat was scattered among the other nations of the world. A little reflection will convince anyone that with our wheat and flour distributed in this manner we are more independent of the Liverpool market than we should be if all our surplus went to that market, and the effect of the Liverpool price on our domestic price consequently less marked.

There is another fact, however, which operates even more strongly to make the Minneapolis and Duluth markets independent of the Liverpool market. The three States producing the bulk of the hard spring wheat are Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota. The terminal markets for this wheat are Minneapolis and Duluth. The milling qualities of this wheat are greatly superior to those of the winter varieties, and all, or practically all, of this wheat is ground into flour in this country. The wheat which is exported and which competes with the wheat of other countries in the Liverpool and other foreign markets is either winter wheat or the other variety of wheat called durum, or macaroni wheat, of which varying quantities are grown in the three spring-wheat States. The Secretary of Agriculture makes the following statement in his 1909 report in regard to the production of durum or macaroni wheat:

> The annual production of durum wheat at present, though difficult to determine before taking a census, appears to be at least 50,000,000 bushels, and probably comes nearer to 60,000,000. * * * The export now averages considerably over 20,000,000 bushels per annum.

The export of all kinds of wheat for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910—the crop of 1909—was, in round numbers, 47,000,000 bushels. Subtracting the export of durum wheat and there would remain not more, and in all probability considerably less, than 27,000,000 bushels as our export of winter and hard spring wheat. The supply of durum wheat has not been an appreciable factor in fixing the price of the other kinds of wheat. It is a wheat that is not now to any extent used for flour in this country. Only a few years ago our millers refused absolutely to buy and grind it. Its price has consequently always been below that of hard spring wheat. A few years ago the difference was as much as 20 cents per bushel. At present the difference is about 10 or 11 cents. In considering the effect of the prices at Liverpool on our domestic price, therefore, we must deduct the export of durum wheat from our total wheat export, as this wheat has in the past competed only indirectly with the other kinds of wheat—in much the same manner, for instance, that oats competes with barley. The remaining 27,000,000 bushels, constituting our total export of winter and spring wheat in 1910, was practically all winter wheat. The statement was made before the Finance Committee, and so far as I know it has not been disputed either before the committee or elsewhere, that not only do we not export any spring wheat, but that even the best grades of northwestern flour never go to Europe. Consequently, while the winter wheat, or part of it, is exported to Europe and other countries, and there comes in competition with wheat from all parts of the world, the hard spring wheat of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota does not come into competition with the wheat produced in other countries, and the world price of wheat does not determine the Minneapolis or Duluth price. The price in the Liverpool market has an indirect effect on the price at Minneapolis and Duluth, as it affects the price of our winter wheat, and the winter wheat will to some extent compete with our spring wheat. If the supply of spring wheat is short, or if its price is very much higher than that of winter wheat, for instance, the winter wheat will to some extent take the place of the spring wheat in the manufacture of flour, although the flour thus manufactured will not compare in quality with that made from spring wheat. It is merely a case of accepting the inferior article if the price of the better one is deemed too high.

How nearly independent we are of the Liverpool market is even better brought out if we take the exports of wheat and wheat flour for the calendar year 1910. During that year we exported, in round numbers, 24,000,000 bushels in the form of wheat and 37,000,000 bushels in the form of flour. If the estimate of the Secretary of Agriculture that our export of durum wheat is in excess of 20,000,000 bushels annually holds good, and I see no reason for doubting it, it is apparent that even in the case of spring wheat the effect of the world's market on its price is only indirect, due to the competition of the flour of other countries with our flour in the world's markets. How much of the flour exported was durum wheat flour I have not been able to learn; but it seems probable that some of it may have been. Taking the lowest figures given by the Secretary as to production and export of durum wheat, 50,000,000 bushels and 20,000,000 bushels, respectively, would leave 30,000,000 bushels to be consumed and disposed of otherwise. The requirements for seed would not exceed four or five million bushels, which would leave some 25,000,000 bushels unaccounted for. While all of this may not be ground into flour in this country, a large part of it undoubtedly is, and making allowance for the consumption of some of it in this country, it seems probable to believe that part of the 37,000,000 bushels exported in the form of flour was durum wheat.

The price of wheat in Canada, however, is dependent on the Liverpool price because of the large percentage of the crop which they export. The wheat which they raise in the Canadian northwest is practically all hard spring wheat; and as they consume only part of it, the remainder is exported to be sold in competition with the wheat from other countries. The result is that the price of No. 1 northern in Winnipeg has been on the average some 11 cents less than the Minneapolis and Duluth price. The Winnipeg price is the price of Port Arthur, ready for export; it is the export price. It has been urged that the difference in price is due to the difference in freight charges, but it should be borne in mind that the distance to Liverpool by the Canadian route is some 600 or 700 miles shorter than by the American route. And as wheat can be shipped through the United States in bond without the payment of duty, if the difference in price were due to the higher freight charges in Canada, the Canadian wheat for export would naturally be shipped through the United States in the manner indicated, the effect of which would be to raise the Winnipeg price. As shipping the wheat in bond does not have this effect on the Winnipeg market, and as the price received by the Canadian farmer for wheat to be shipped in bond through the United States is from 10 to 15 cents less than that received by the American farmer within 4 or 5 miles, or sometimes less, of the same point, it is evident that the difference in price is not due to the difference in freight charges. An attempt was made to show before the Finance Committee that the difference was due to laws enacted in Canada, prohibiting the trading in futures or hedging, and that this restriction on the grain trading at Winnipeg had resulted in depressing the price below the Minneapolis level. The Winnipeg Grain Exchange, however, has denied that there is any law preventing hedging, and has stated that country elevators sell daily purchases as hedge as regular thing, and that the exchange floor business at Winnipeg is practically the same as at Minneapolis. I do not see there can be any escape from the conclusion that the higher price for hard spring wheat in our markets is due to the fact that our markets are independent of the Liverpool market and the tariff on wheat prevents the importation of wheat from Canada. Lest anyone should think that perhaps the Canadian wheat is an inferior product, I will say that No. 1 northern wheat in Canada must weigh 60 pounds to the bushel, while No. 1 northern wheat in the markets in this country is not required to weigh more than 58 pounds to the bushel. It consequently takes better wheat to grade No. 1 northern in Canada than it does in the United States.

In order to secure definite information as to what the difference actually is between the price received by the American farmer for wheat and that received by the Canadian farmer, I wrote to Mr. George McLean, a grain dealer at Sarles, N. Dak. Besides buying American wheat, Mr. McLean buys Canadian wheat in bond. In buying Canadian wheat he has the competition of the Canadian wheat buyers in the neighboring Canadian towns, and, of course, has to pay at least the full price that the Canadian buyers do, and possibly a little more, as in all probability the Canadian farmer has to haul his grain a little farther in order to sell it to Mr. McLean than he has to in order to reach his Canadian markets. Sarles is located some 3 or 4 miles south of the Canadian boundary. North of the boundary line are the towns of Cartwright, Clearwater, and Crystal City—none of them more than 10 miles from the line. These towns are situated in the Province of Manitoba, on a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, within 100 miles of the great city of Winnipeg. I wish to insert here, and have made a part of my remarks, Mr. McLean's reply, which gives the prices paid for American and Canadian wheat at Sarles during the months of October and November last:

Mr. Gronna, these are actual prices paid on the above dates and can be verified if necessary.

Yours, very respectfully, GEORGE MCLEAN.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to state to my colleague that the Canadian wheat is purchased and sold in bond, so that no tariff has to be paid on it.

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly; no tariff at all has to be paid. I shall touch upon that point in a few moments.

The difference in price at Sarles in favor of the American market ranges from 10 to 15 cents, and averages just a little less than 13 cents during the two months for which the prices are given. Is it any wonder that the Canadian farmer is anxious to enter the American markets with his wheat when he sees his neighbor right across the boundary line—only a few miles distant, their fields perhaps touching—receive on the average 13 cents more for every bushel of wheat that he sells? And is it any wonder that the American farmer is opposed to an agreement which will permit the Canadians to sell their surplus in the markets of this country, and which everyone expects will result in bringing the markets in the two countries to the same level?

The free admission of Canadian wheat in competition with our hard spring wheat can have no other effect than bringing the markets for this kind of wheat in the two countries to the same level. Whether the immediate result would be to reduce the American market to the present level of the Canadian market, or whether the Canadian price would be increased somewhat, I shall not undertake to say. In view of the large surplus which Canada even now has, however, I am inclined to believe that the price of wheat would rise little in Canada, if at all. There would be a decided decline in the price on this side of the line. Of the ultimate result there can be little doubt. Canada has such vast possibilities before her as a wheat-raising country that only a very few years would be required until her production of the hard varieties of wheat would far exceed the combined consumption of the two countries, and the price received for the surplus exported and sold in the world's markets would determine the price received by the American as well as the Canadian farmers.

Another effect which the free admission of Canadian wheat would have, distinct from that above noted, which may not be apparent to one who is not conversant with actual conditions, is the effect of dumping a large supply of wheat into the terminal markets in the fall. The Canadian Northwest is a new country. In new wheat-growing countries the grain is sold practically from the thrashing machine. The new settler needs money to pay the bills contracted during the year, which are payable as soon as he has thrashed his wheat, and hurries his grain to the market as soon as it reaches him from the spout of the thrashing machine. The result is that most of the wheat is marketed at practically the same time, and the markets are glutted. The unusually heavy receipts invariably result in unduly low prices, and the farmer who is compelled to sell in the same market at that time receives less for his wheat than it is actually worth. In sections that have been longer settled the grain is marketed more gradually and the prices are more stable. If Canadian wheat is admitted free there can be no doubt that the millions of bushels of wheat produced in that new country will come pouring over the border in the fall of the year and glut the Minneapolis and Duluth markets to the further injury of the American wheat grower.

The President has stated at various times that conditions of production are so similar on the two sides of the boundary line that it is evident that the Canadian farmers have no advantage over ours, and that consequently the Republican platform, which declares for a tariff sufficient to cover the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, is not violated by this agreement. As a matter of fact the conditions are not similar. The mere fact that wages may be the same per day, and that there may not be much difference in the cost of living, does not make the conditions of producing grain similar. Other things have to be taken into consideration. Old land will require more cultivation to produce a crop than new land, and may require the use of fertilizers. With the same cultivation the new land will produce a crop much greater than the old land, and the labor cost per unit of production on the old land may be several times that on the new land, even though the daily wages paid may be exactly the same. Further, land in an old settled section will cost more than new land in a country just opening up. Now, Canada has the new, cheaper, more productive lands, and we have the older, less productive, dearer lands. It would seem that no argument would be needed to convince anyone that with these conditions the cost of raising a bushel of wheat is necessarily greater in the United States than in Canada, and yet the statement is gravely made and reiterated whenever an attempt is made to show that the farmer has no right to complain because of this measure.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. I take it that the Senator is about to leave that particular question; and, if so, I desire to make a suggestion at that point.

Mr. GRONNA. I will be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. The question of the balance of trade in noncompetitive articles, of course, simply means that one country must buy noncompetitive articles somewhere. If they buy them all of one country, it means nothing as to competition, but the balance of trade in competitive articles means something as to the ability of a country to compete. According to the President's own figures, the balance of trade for the year ending the 1st of July, 1910, I think, in favor of the United States was $119,000,000, but to get that balance of trade the United States had to sell enough additional in Canada to make up a balance of trade against us in agricultural products; in other words, take the articles which this bill advances to the free list—and I use the word "advances" advisably, for corn is already on the free list and of course we have a balance of trade on corn.

Mr. GRONNA. And the same is true of cotton.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but take the articles which this bill advances to the free list, consisting principally of farm products, and in those articles for that year Canada had a balance of trade against us of $22,000,000. There is a concrete fact of more value, it seems to me, than all the disputes by the day as to whether a man gets $1.13 or $1.12 in one country or the other. In this balancing of competitive articles the balance was against us $22,000,000, which shows beyond any controversy that we simply can not compete with Canada upon those articles, and yet those are the articles it is proposed to advance to the free list.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator is absolutely correct in that statement, according to my view. The agreement will not only be detrimental to the farmer in that it will depress his prices, but it will be detrimental to the country as a whole.

Mr. Collins, testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, gives the cost of raising a bushel of wheat in Minnesota and the two Dakotas as 65 cents per bushel, and in Saskatchewan as 39 cents per bushel. The cost, according to these figures, is 26 cents less in Saskatchewan. Mr. Chamberlain, testifying before the same committee, arrives at a cost of 57 cents per bushel in the United States and 40 cents per bushel in Canada—a difference of 17 cents per bushel in favor of the Canadian farmer. Mr. Chamberlain does not seem to have taken into account, however, the higher price of land in the United States—as he takes $8 as the cost per acre of raising wheat in both countries—which would operate to make the difference in cost per bushel greater than that given by him. Mr. Thomas H. Cooper, of the State University of Minnesota, submitted to the Select Committee on Wages and Prices of Commodities a statement showing that the average cost of production on a number of farms, records for which for a series of years have been kept at the university, was as follows for the years 1908 and 1909: Wheat, 75 cents per bushel; oats, 38.3 cents per bushel; corn, 41.2 cents per bushel; barley, 40.9 cents per bushel; flax, $1.037 per bushel; potatoes, 30 cents per bushel. I believe that these figures more nearly represent the actual cost of the above-named farm products than those of Mr. Collins and Mr. Chamberlain. I have had figures submitted to me, however, by actual farmers in North Dakota showing a much higher cost of production than those of Mr. Cooper. Without expressing any opinion as to what the exact cost of raising a bushel of wheat may be, I will say that I do not see how anyone who has taken the trouble to inquire as to the yield in the Canadian Northwest and the yields in our wheat-producing States and the prices of lands in the two countries, can make the statement that it costs no more to produce a bushel of wheat in the United States than it does in Canada. The average yield of the Canadian wheat fields in 1909 was 21¼ bushels per acre. The average yield of the United States the same year was 15.8 bushels per acre. The yield in Minnesota was 16.8 bushels; in North Dakota, 13.7; in South Dakota, 14.1. The average yield in the United States in 1910 was 14.1 bushels. In Minnesota the yield was 16 bushels; in South Dakota, 12.8 bushels; in North Dakota, 5 bushels. The yield in Canada was also somewhat less than the year before, the total wheat crop being some 17,000,000 bushels less, while the acreage was greater.

I have spent considerable time on the question of how this measure will affect the price of wheat, because wheat is the great staple production of my State. The prosperity of the farmers of North Dakota depends on the wheat crop and the price received for that crop. Last year there was a short crop because of drought, and it seems an act of wanton cruelty to inflict this measure on the farmers of that section, when they will need every dollar they can possibly receive for their grain in order to recover from the setback received last year.

In the case of barley the measure will not affect the North Dakota farmer as much as it will the farmers of other States. When we come to flax, however, the blow again strikes the farmers of my State. North Dakota usually produces about three-fifths of all the flax raised in this country. The annual production of flax in the United States is usually about 25,000,000 bushels. Practically all of this is consumed in the United States. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, we exported 882,889 bushels, and in the year ending June 30, 1910, only 65,193 bushels. This year considerable quantities will have to be imported, as last year's production was only slightly more than 14,000,000 bushels. The price in this country is consequently not dependent on the markets in other countries. And yet it is contended that removing this duty will not in any way affect the farmer. The production of flax in Canada is increasing, the acreage in 1910 being more than three times that in 1909. The average yield of flax in the United States was 9.4 bushels in 1909; in 1910 it was 4.8 bushels. In Canada the average yields for the same years were 15.98 bushels and 7.97 bushels, respectively. With the free admission of Canadian flax it will inevitably result in lowering the price of flax in this country. And it is to be noted in the case of flax, as in that of wheat, that the removal of the tariff will not result in decreasing the cost to the consumer as the tariff is still retained on linseed oil. The more a person studies this measure the more is he impressed with the care which has been taken to retain the duties on manufactures, while removing it on raw materials. I will say that by "raw materials" I mean the products of the farmer, which, of course, as my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] suggests to me, are not raw materials, but the farmers' finished products.

Some supporters of this measure are wont to speak of Canadians in farm products as negligible, and refer to the exports of Canadian wheat, for instance, as unimportant. While I do not like to advertise the advantages of a foreign country as compared with our own, I feel it incumbent upon me to call attention to some of the facts with regard to Canada. West of the Red River of the North, and stretching northward from the boundary of the United States, lies the great Canadian Northwest. Stretching 1,000 miles from Winnipeg to the Rockies, and 500 miles northward from the boundary, she has what is claimed to be the largest unbroken wheat field in the world. The area of the three prairie Provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta is equal to the combined areas of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Missouri. The future wheat production of this region is estimated at from 1,000,000,000 to 1,600,000,000 bushels, or from one and a half to two and a half times the present production of the United States; and yet it is said that the enactment of the reciprocity bill will not affect the American farmer. In 1909 Saskatchewan alone, with 50,000,000 of her 60,000,000 acres of arable land unbroken prairies, produced 91,000,000 bushels of wheat. In addition to that she produced more than 105,000,000 bushels of oats, almost 8,000,000 bushels of barley, and nearly 4,500,000 bushels of flax. Alberta has 100,000,000 acres of agricultural land, with only 1,000,000 at present under cultivation. Manitoba is the oldest of the three Provinces, but it is estimated that only 20 per cent of her arable land is under cultivation.

During the year ending March 31, 1910, 208,794 immigrants entered Canada, 103,798 of whom came from the United States. It does not require a prophet to see what the effect on wheat raising in the United States will be of the free admission of Canadian grain. In two or three years Canada will export more wheat and flour than we do. If we admit her wheat free, not only will it compete with our hard spring wheat and force the price down to the level of the world's market, but it will displace a large part of the winter wheat which is now mixed with the northwestern hard wheat for milling purposes, and the States producing winter wheat will be compelled to find a market for most of their product abroad, instead of exporting only the surplus as at present. It should be further noted in this connection—and I ask the Senate to pay particular attention to this—that with the tariff removed from wheat the American wheat grower is in danger of being discriminated against in the matter of freight rates. The American railroads will be sure of the carrying of the American grain, but for the carrying of the Canadian grain they will have to compete with the Canadian lines, the inevitable result of which would seem to be lower rates for Canadian producers than for American producers. The American farmers being at noncompetitive points will have to help pay the cost of carrying the grain of the Canadian farmers located at competitive points. There can be no question about that, Mr. President.

President Taft made a speech at Chicago on the 3d of June in which he undertook to defend this agreement. In connection with his discussion of the effects of the measure on agriculture, he makes the following statement:

> Canada is so far north that her agricultural products are practically limited to wheat, rye, barley, oats, potatoes, live cattle, horses, and dairy products.

He might have added to the above flax and hay, and he would have no difficulty in finding a number of States on this side of the line whose agricultural products are limited to those enumerated. He dwells upon the fact that Canada produces no cotton and little corn as a reason why this measure will not injure the farmer. It would seem that it was hardly necessary to call attention to the fact that Canada will not be a competitor in the production of cotton and corn. She does produce the products enumerated above, and when we admit these free of duty they must inevitably compete with our products. The reason that Canada entered into this agreement was that she wanted a better market for these products, and she expects to find it in this country. Canada had no duty on either cotton or corn, and we had no duty on cotton. The removal of the duty on corn is not going to affect the price of either of those products in any way, and I do not know that anyone has maintained that it will. The crops which the different Provinces of Canada produce, however, are the crops that our border States across the line from those Provinces produce, and whether we like to admit it or not, it can not be denied that the Canadian products will compete with ours in our own markets.

The President continues:

> She (Canada) imports a large amount of cottonseed oil, which, by the Canadian reciprocity treaty, is now made free; she can not fatten cattle as they are fattened in the United States, and therefore it has become very profitable for American farmers to import young cattle from Canada even with the duty on them and to fatten them for the Chicago market.

Now, mark this—

> The United States imports into Canada a great many more horses than she exports from the Canadians. She sends to Canada a much larger amount of potatoes than she receives from her. The United States imports into Canada about 15 times as much of meat and dairy products as Canada imports into the United States.

Mr. President, I deny that statement, or at least a part of it.

The President apparently expects the farmer to derive some benefit from the free admission of cottonseed oil by Canada, but as the farmer does not manufacture cottonseed oil, I believe it must be conceded that if any benefit is derived it will not be by the farmer. So far as the statement that it has become very profitable for the American farmers to import Canadian cattle, even with the duty on them and to fatten them for the Chicago market, is concerned, I have been unable to find anything that would in any way warrant such an assertion. The number of cattle imported from Canada, on which duty was paid, during the fiscal year 1909, was 10,061. In 1910 the number was 5,168. The receipts of cattle at our principal markets are somewhat more than 9,000,000 a year. Whatever may be the result of the removal of the duty on cattle, it is apparent that there is not now any such industry as the importation of Canadian cattle for the purpose of fattening them for the Chicago market, as the President seems to have been led to believe. Farmers appearing before the Finance Committee flatly contradicted the statement that Canadian cattle were imported for this purpose. If it were a fact that the Canadian farmers can raise cattle so much cheaper than the Americans that cattle can profitably be imported under the present duty, it would appear an argument for increasing the duty rather than removing it, if the farmer is to be treated as other producers are in the matter of tariff legislation. The present tariff, however, appears to be fully protective. The total number of cattle of all kinds in the United States is, in round numbers, 70,000,000. The total number in Canada is 7,000,000. The result of the removal of the duty would no doubt be an increasing import of cattle from Canada, resulting in lower prices for our cattle raisers, cheaper cattle for the packers, and no reduction in the price of meat paid by the consumer.

The statement that we send to Canada a much larger amount of potatoes than we receive from her is not quite exact. The imports from and exports to Canada of potatoes for the last five years are as follows:

Years.	Imports from Canada.	Exports to Canada.
	Bushels.	Bushels.
1906	421,106	171,010
1907	11,393	136,360
1908	177,102	169,029
1909	1,181,693	107,425
1910	97,138	207,764
Total	1,888,421	791,588

Our total imports of potatoes from Canada for the last five years are 1,888,421 bushels, and our exports to Canada 791,588 bushels. So we do not export as many potatoes to Canada as we import from that country. These figures are taken from Commerce and Navigation of the United States for the year 1910, and are presumably correct.

The President's statement that we export fifteen times as much meat and dairy products to Canada as we import from Canada is in danger of being misleading, so far as dairy products are concerned. In the fiscal year 1910 we exported to Canada dairy products to the value of $86,230, while we imported dairy products to the value of $831,378. Our imports of these products were almost ten times as great as our exports. These imports came into our country in spite of our duties of 6 cents a pound on butter and cheese, 2 cents a gallon on milk, and 5 cents a gallon on cream. The removal of the duties on these products will, of course, result in a greatly increased importation, with the usual result on the prices received by our dairy farmers.

Now, I want my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] to pay particular attention, inasmuch as he is a farmer. So far as meat products are concerned the President is correct in the statement that we export to Canada far more than we import from Canada, but the farmer does not export and sell these products, and the duties on them have not been removed. The Beef Trust sells the meat products, and it will still have the benefit of a high protective duty.

The President says further:

The only real importation of agricultural products that we may expect from Canada of any considerable amount will consist of wheat, barley, rye, and oats. The world price of these four cereals is fixed abroad, where the surplus from the producing countries is disposed of, and is little affected by the place from which the supply is derived. Canadian wheat nets, perhaps, 10 cents less a bushel to the producer than what grows in the Dakotas or in Minnesota—

Now, mark this. The President admits that the Canadian farmers receive 10 cents a bushel less, and then he gives the reason or attempts to do so—due to the fact that exporting that wheat and warehousing it and transporting it to Liverpool is considerably greater than the cost to the Dakota farmer of disposing of his wheat to the millers of Minneapolis or sending it abroad.

Besides the agricultural products mentioned by the President Canada will also send us cattle, sheep, potatoes, hay, dairy products, and flaxseed. Consul Frank Deedmeyer, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, makes the following interesting report as to what that small island has now available for export to the United States in the event of the passage of this measure:

There are now available in Prince Edward Island for shipment to the United States, if freed from tariff duties, 100,000 bushels of potatoes, 500,000 bushels of turnips and other roots, 2,000,000 bushels of oats, 100,000 bushels of seed oats, 150,000 tons of hay, 600,000 pounds of cheese, 100,000 pounds of butter, 1,000,000 dozen eggs.

The President makes the bald statement that the difference in the price of wheat received by the North Dakota farmer and that received by the Canadian farmer is due to the greater cost of "exporting that wheat and warehousing it and transporting it to Liverpool." I do not happen to have any figures at hand as to the transportation charges from Port Arthur to Liverpool and from Duluth to Liverpool, but it was stated before the Finance Committee, and I am sure my colleague will bear me out in the statement that they are the same. If the difference in price were due to the greater cost of transporting the Canadian wheat to Liverpool, the difference in price ought to be, approximately, equal to the difference in cost of transportation. Now, even if the Canadian transportation system were so much inferior to ours that it cost the Canadian exporter 10 cents more to ship a bushel of wheat to Liverpool than it costs the American exporter, as the President would have us believe, the Canadian has the very simple alternative of shipping his wheat in bond—of taking advantage of our superior transportation facilities and shipping his grain through the United States without paying any duty. As he sells his grain for 10 cents less than his American cousin receives and does not ship his wheat in bond—or if he does does it not result in his receiving the same price—there surely must be some other reason for this difference.

The President continues:

If, now, the duty is to be taken off of wheat and the Canadian wheat can come to the millers of Minneapolis and other places, it can and will be made into flour, because the capacity of the American mills is 33 per cent greater than is needed to mill the wheat of this country.

I am quoting from the President's speech—

Canadian wheat can be imported and ground into flour without materially reducing the demand for or price of American wheat, and the surplus will be sent abroad as flour. The price of Canadian wheat will doubtless be increased a few cents by access to the market nearer at hand, but the access to the market nearer at hand will not reduce the price of his wheat to the American farmer, for the reasons stated.

If, as the President says, the capacity of the American mills is 33 per cent greater than the production of American wheat, why is it that we every year export more wheat as wheat than in the form of flour? Why should not these American mills find work in the grinding of American wheat instead of Canadian wheat? If the reason that more American wheat is not exported as flour is that the European countries discriminate against our flour in favor of our wheat, would not that same cause operate as against grinding Canadian wheat, proceeding on the assumption that the President's premises are correct? And further, if there are other reasons, not apparent, which prevent the American mills from grinding their full capacity of American wheat, why do not those mills now grind Canadian wheat in bond or under the drawback privilege? The mills can import Canadian wheat, under the present law, and grind it, and if they export the flour and by-products they are refunded 99 per cent of the duty paid, in other words they are required to pay a duty of only one-fourth cent per bushel. If it is not profitable to do this and export the flour now, will it be profitable to grind Canadian wheat for export if the duty is removed? And if, as seems the inevitable conclusion, that flour will not be exported, how can we escape from the conclusion that the flour made from Canadian wheat will displace an equal amount of flour made from American wheat?

The President continues in his enumeration of the benefits to be derived by the American farmer:

A very material benefit to all the farmers of the country, especially the stock and cattle raisers and the dairy farmers, will be the by-products of bran and shorts from the flour mills likely to follow the free export of wheat from Canada to those mills. These by-products are now so scarce and so high priced that many farmers are unable to procure them.

Will any Senator here tell me how the farmer is going to buy his bran and shorts any cheaper with a duty of 12½ cents per hundred or $2.50 per ton?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course he could not get it any cheaper, but he could have some consolation possibly—that is, if he could follow some people's theory, the evident theory of the authors of this bill—in the thought that the wheat which had been made from it had been put on the free list. That would be about all the consolation he would get out of it.

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct.

If the price of bran and shorts is so high now that many farmers are unable to procure them, as the President states, the simple and effective way to remedy this would be to place these by-products on the free list.

I believe my farmer friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] will agree with me on that.

This measure retains a duty of 12½ cents per 100 pounds. If, as there is reason to believe, the free admission of wheat will merely give the millers cheaper wheat, and permit them to grind Canadian wheat instead of American wheat, without materially increasing the amount of wheat ground, there will be no increase of the supply of bran and shorts and their price will not be lowered. The removal of the duty on the raw material is not an effective way of reducing the price of either the manufactured product or the by-product so long as the duties on those remain.

The President, after reiterating his belief that the adoption of this measure will not reduce the price of wheat and other farm products "in any marked way," continues:

It will, however, by enlarging the source of supply, prevent undue fluctuations, and it will and ought to prevent an exorbitant increase in the prices of farm products—

I hope every farmer will pay marked attention to this. I still quote from the President's speech—which, as they have been for the last three or four years, have inured greatly to the profit of all engaged in agriculture.

Who is there here who will take and defend the utterances made by a Republican President against the interests of all the American producers of this great country?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not see the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] present.

Mr. GRONNA. I like the Senator from Missouri. I wish he were here. He honored me with his presence for a little while. I only hoped he would remain, and I believe that even the distinguished Senator from Missouri would have learned something about wheat and a few other things.

Reduced to its lowest terms, this expression of the President means that while the measure will not reduce the price of wheat and other farm products below the present level, it will, and the President hopes it will, prevent the price from increasing in the future.

The only undue fluctuations that it will prevent will be the increase in price due to short crops. In other words, when our farmers suffer from drought, as did the western farmers last year, and it becomes a serious question with them how to tide over until the next crop is harvested, the President would have the Canadian wheat as a supply to fall back upon in order to prevent the farmer from getting a slightly higher price for his wheat because of the shortage.

That is the statement made by my friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], if I remember correctly.

The President enters a flat denial of the statement that because of our higher tariffs the price of living is higher here than in Canada, and in support of this denial points to two facts: (1) We export to Canada $225,000,000 worth of goods of the widest variety of manufactures, while England, having a preference of 33⅓ per cent in the matter of tariffs, exports goods to Canada worth only $93,000,000. (2) In negotiating this agreement the President directed the American commissioners "to secure as great a cut in the duties on manufactures in Canada as they could," but they were unable to secure any more than appears in this treaty, for the reason that Canada would not expose her manufacturers to the competition of American manufacturers, which is a very conclusive proof that the manufactured products that enter into the cost of living are higher in Canada than they are in the United States. With regard to the first fact, it might be suggested that most people would regard it as proof that our manufacturers can compete with the English manufacturers on even terms, at least in the Canadian markets, and presumably in our markets, and that they consequently do not need protection. The same persons would not necessarily find the second proof conclusive, for the reason that it has often been charged that the American manufacturers are in the habit of selling their goods cheaper in Canada than in the United States, and that while the Canadian manufacturers may believe that the American manufacturers can sell their goods cheaper than they themselves can sell the same goods, it is no proof that the American manufacturers do sell those goods cheaper in the American markets.

I want my distinguished friend again to pay attention to this, because I know he will be interested in what I am about to say. I remember he asked some questions a couple of weeks ago why the opening up of the new Northwestern States had not caused a decline in the lands in neighboring States. I am not quoting the Senator verbatim, but, I believe, in substance, and I am going to show him—at least I shall attempt to show—how it works.

The President, to disprove the contention that the free admission to our markets of the products of the cheaper Canadian lands will operate to lower the prices of farm lands in this country, cites the fact that the value of the lands in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and other States has increased in spite of the opening up of the lands in Kansas, Nebraska, and North and South Dakota in the two decades from 1890 to 1910. The conditions are not quite the same, however. On the opening up of the new wheat lands in the newer States, Iowa, Illinois, and the other States mentioned did surrender the growing of wheat very largely to the new States, turning their attention to raising corn and hogs. If there had not been these other things to turn to, the value of their lands would beyond a doubt have been seriously affected. Kansas and Nebraska can hardly be said to have been opened up since 1890. The population of Nebraska has increased only 130,000 since 1890, and the population of Kansas about 270,000. Between 1890 and 1900 the population of Kansas increased only 42,000, and the population of Nebraska only 3,644. This in spite of the fact that both of these States are great corn States, Kansas producing 169,000,000 bushels in 1910, and Nebraska 206,000,000 bushels. The only States that exceeded Nebraska's production last year were Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri. In the case of the competition of Canadian lands, however, it must be borne in mind that not all the States on this side of the line can turn to other crops. North Dakota will continue to raise wheat, flax, oats, and barley, if it raises anything, and it will have to do this in competition with the cheaper and more productive Canadian lands. This can have only one effect on land values in that State. Some of the other States at present growing wheat and other small grains may turn to corn, but there will be a decided loss because of the forced change of crop and the increased competition in the raising of corn. Even States that may not feel the Canadian competition directly will be affected indirectly.

That is just how Kansas and Nebraska are going to be affected and every corn-producing State. Further, the area with which we are now to be brought into competition is greatly in excess of that brought into competition with our older lands by the opening up of our last west. As has been shown, the three prairie Provinces of Canada contain as much land as eight or nine of the States comprising our Middle West, and practically all of it is fitted for the production of wheat and other grains. With the efforts of the Canadian Government, the Canadian railroads, and the land companies to promote immigration to that region, the opening up of the Canadian lands will proceed at a much more rapid rate than did the opening up and settlement of our lands. The settling of North Dakota has been in progress for 30 years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As I recall it, the question which I addressed here upon the floor to a Senator who had been speaking was something like this: He had quoted from some statistical tables to show that the average value of farm lands in North Dakota was some $40 or $45 per acre, whereas in Canada the land was worth $20 or $25 per acre, and he drew the conclusion that if that $25 land in Canada was thrown into competition with the $40 land in North Dakota the results would be disastrous to the North Dakota farmer. The question I put to him was whether he argued from that that the competition of the North Dakota farmer with the $40 land had been disastrous to the farmers in Nebraska with their $100 land; and I drew his attention to the fact that there is as much disparity in the value of farm lands in the agricultural States of the United States as there is between the value of farm lands in North Dakota and Canada, and that these lands nevertheless competed with each other without any serious consequences.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Nebraska contend that these lands compete with each other without any serious consequences?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My impression is that the prosperity of Nebraska was not seriously affected by the development of North Dakota, and we in Nebraska have rejoiced to see the neighboring States and Territories develop. We would rather see a State like North or South Dakota prosperous in its agriculture than to see it a desert waste; and so it seems to me the people of the United States would rather see a great prosperous agricultural empire in Canada than to see a rolling desert of Sahara there. I believe it is a better neighbor.

Mr. BORAH. It might make some difference whether they are under our flag or under another man's flag. But does not the Senator from Nebraska think that the opening of Nebraska and Illinois and Wisconsin and all that great region had a very powerful effect upon the productiveness, or the capacity to produce, of the eastern farmer?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the fact is that the eastern farmer had exhausted his land and that his crop average had been reduced year by year until it was approaching the point where it would be impossible to continue the cultivation.

Mr. BAILEY. Except at high prices.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think, furthermore, that the development of a neighboring State in the way it is pictured that Canada will develop will immeasurably improve the conditions in the United States for their mutual and reciprocal trade relations. I believe that this country will get great benefit, even if Canada does develop in the marvelous way of which the Senators tell and which I think is grossly exaggerated.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, when the lands of the Middle West were opened up the farms in the East began to be abandoned. Within the last seven or eight years those farms are again being taken up and rehabilitated, owing to the increase in the price of farm products. Now, the question is whether it is better for us to raise our own products, when we can, than to skin our farms, as we will do in Nebraska and the Dakotas and other places, as we did in the East, and move on to Canada.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Idaho has committed an inaccuracy there. The prices of farm products are now no higher than they have been for 10 years in the past.

The fact is that there is an attempt being made to revive the abandoned farms of the East, but it is an attempt that is being made along scientific lines to make productive what has been allowed to become a desert, and allowed to become so by exhaustion of the soil. The attempt is now being made not so much by individual farmers as by great railroads to restore those lands to productivity by putting enrichment upon them.

Mr. BORAH. And they are doing so because the price of farm products warrants them in doing so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the price of farm products is not now so high as it was two years ago.

Mr. BORAH. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And 10 years ago they were as high as recently.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is about correct in his dates. It was just about 10 years ago that the price of farm products began to rise, and ever since that time there has been a noticeable retardation of the movement from the farm to the city, and the taking up of the abandoned farms and occupying them and rehabilitating them and recultivating them have been going on, and it has been by reason of the fact that the increase in the price of farm products has warranted them in doing so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, I may say to my friend, the Senator from Idaho, that there is also another reason why the farms of the East were abandoned besides that they had become exhausted. One reason is that the party to which the Senator belongs for the last generation or more has been placing an enormous premium upon industrial occupations, has been offering a great allurement to people to move into the cities and to abandon their farms, and has been placing upon agriculture a great burden which, up to this time, it has endured for the benefit of those cities and towns which have been growing while the country has been under a process of depopulation.

Mr. BORAH. The charge that the Senator makes is, in a measure, true. But until we secured the active agency and cooperation of the party to which the Senator belongs we have never been able to put the farmer upon a free-trade basis and the manufacturer upon a highly protective basis, which the Senator and his party are helping us to do now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that the most distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], a prominent leader of the party to which the Senator belongs, and of which he is also a leader, upon the floor of the Senate within 10 days made the statement the tariffs which have been placed upon the products of the farm in the past have, in his opinion, been of no benefit to the farmer.

Mr. BORAH. Until lately.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; he made the statement that they had been in the past of no benefit to the farmer, although they had been there for a generation, and although the Democratic Party and the Democratic leaders had been arguing that those tariffs placed upon agricultural products were put there for the purpose of hoodwinking the farmer into the belief that he had a share in the plunder of this protective tariff.

Mr. BORAH. I appeal to the RECORD, that the Senator from New York used the exact language that until late the protective tariff had not been of benefit to the farmer—that until late years he had not received any benefit therefrom.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is mistaken. I quoted the exact language of the Senator from New York.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That has been reiterated a half a dozen times by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from New York distinctly stated that if they would read all the language it would qualify what they had quoted.

Mr. GRONNA. In justice to the Senator from New York, who does not happen to be present just now, I will see that that part of his remarks is inserted in my speech.

Mr. BAILEY. Right at this point——

Mr. STONE. May I be permitted to interpose?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. STONE. While the Senator is inserting the remarks of the Senator from New York——

Mr. GRONNA. I intended to quote the Senator from New York, but I have so many things that I want to touch upon that I eliminated what would have made many pages.

Mr. STONE. Well, it is a pity the Senator did that, if what he destroyed was as good as that he has delivered.

Mr. GRONNA. I am glad to know the Senator from Missouri appreciates it.

Mr. STONE. Yes. I want to suggest to my friend the Senator from North Dakota that while he is inserting what the Senator from New York said, that which the Senator from Nebraska has quoted——

Mr. WARREN. In part.

Mr. STONE. I suppose in part. He certainly did not quote the entire speech.

Mr. GRONNA. I said upon that particular point, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. I was going to suggest that it might be well in a parallel column to insert a wise remark made by one of the wisest of our colleagues, the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], during the debate on the Payne-Aldrich bill. At that time, when answering a question propounded to him by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from Minnesota said that while he could not at the moment tell how many bushels of wheat had been raised in a given year in Minnesota, he was prepared to state with the utmost confidence that the tariff had never benefited the farmers of Minnesota and had never added a farthing to the market price of their wheat; that the market value of wheat was fixed in Liverpool, and so on and so forth.

I am just suggesting that it would be most enlightening to the public in general and to the constituency of my friend, the Senator from North Dakota, in particular, if he would include that among his quotations.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield, and to whom?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that I am very sorry to learn of the mental condition he is in with respect to this question of wheat. I am unwilling to take up the time of the Senator from North Dakota to answer him at this time. But later on in the discussion I shall take pains to give the Senator from Missouri some of the A B C's in respect to the prices of wheat, and hope to have him converted.

Mr. STONE. I do not know just what my friend means by my mental condition——

Mr. NELSON. I refer to the question of wheat——

Mr. STONE. On the subject of wheat. I do not know just what the Senator means. I know what I referred to, for I have been quoting as nearly literally as I can from memory a very wise expression, and a very correct one, delivered two years ago on the floor of the Senate by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Minnesota, and I have suggested that the Senator from North Dakota, while quoting from the Senator from New York, should embrace the other for the enlightenment of his constituents.

Mr. NELSON. In the first place, I want to say to the Senator from Missouri he does not quote me entirely and fully and correctly; and, in the next place, I shall endeavor to point out to him that the conditions which were existing then are entirely different from the conditions which are existing now.

Mr. STONE. Two years ago——

Mr. NELSON. But I am unwilling to take up the time of the Senator from North Dakota. He has quite a bit of a speech yet to make and has been on his feet for nearly two hours; but later on I will try to satisfy the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. If it be possible that my friend has changed his opinion and his position, I am sorry to hear it. If he has changed, then the Senator from North Dakota need not quote from him. I was supposing that the Senator from Minnesota was standing by his utterance of two years ago.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe that the Senator from Minnesota is perfectly able to take care of himself, and the Senate will undoubtedly do him the honor to give him sufficient time to explain his position. I can only promise that I shall be very glad to be here to listen to the debate between the two distinguished Senators.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator from North Dakota resumes——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; for a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to justify what I said——

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As to my accuracy in quoting the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. He used this language——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from New York said a great deal, and I certainly would do an injustice to the Senator from New York to incorporate his entire speech into my remarks. Unless the Senator from Nebraska will read that particular portion of the speech of the Senator from New York, I hardly think it would be fair to read merely a part of his remarks on the subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from North Dakota will remember that the Senator from Idaho questioned the accuracy of my quotation, and in order to justify my quotation I should like to read a few sentences.

Mr. GRONNA. I said to the Senator from Nebraska that I would agree to incorporate in my remarks the statement made by the Senator from New York touching upon wheat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will advise the Chair whether he yields or does not yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska just to incorporate that particular quotation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I quote from the speech of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], on page 2427:

I never have thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from New York said more than that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; he said more than that. I will read the whole paragraph if the Senator desires. I have read only that much to show that I was right in my statement that he used that language.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the quotation——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska is not reading the entire statement.

Mr. BAILEY. He is reading another part.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I supposed. I have just found what the Senator has read, but the Senator will remember that we discussed a day or two afterwards that remark of the Senator from New York and referred to the proposition that he said "until lately," and it is so printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In this whole paragraph the Senator from New York did not qualify his expression in that way. I will repeat what he said. It is a sentence, complete:

I never have thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer.

Mr. GRONNA. But, Mr. President, the Senator from New York did qualify that statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield, and to whom?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say, Mr. President, that the Senator from Nebraska and the other Senators of like mind ought to take into account that the Senator from New York is not a farmer.

Mr. GRONNA. I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska is right as to one passage in the speech; the Senator from Idaho is right as to another passage in the speech. If the Senator from Nebraska will turn back to the first column on page 2427 he will find that after making substantially the same statement there which the Senator from Nebraska has read from the second column the Senator from New York then uses substantially and practically the language attributed to him by the Senator from Idaho, and it is this:

But with the increase of our cities as compared with our farming population and the using up of our waste lands and the fencing in of old cattle ranges and the reduction of the productive power of our land we have about come to the point where the continuance of those duties, instead of being a matter of indifference to the people of the country, would result in putting up the cost of food.

It is a little difficult for a man to make a speech on that side of the question without falling into these contradictions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will proceed.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a decade is likely to see the prairies of Canada settled. The effect of the free admission of Canadian products will be comparable to the effect of the opening of the West on the agriculture of New England and other Eastern States. It seems hardly necessary to call attention to the abandoned farms and depressed land prices and the emigration from that section of the agricultural population which resulted.

The President also contends that the natural change in farming in this country is from the raising of wheat and other cereals for export to the raising of grain for farm consumption and development of the secondary products in the form of cattle and hogs. He fails to take into consideration that there are some sections of our country that can produce wheat and other grains that can not produce corn at an advantage. North Dakota is not a corn-growing and hog-raising State, but it does raise wheat and flax and other grains, and it certainly is not statesmanship to try to force the people of that section to discontinue the raising of crops for which the State is best fitted for the growing of crops for which it is less fitted and which it may never be possible to produce extensively with profit. It has appeared to me that in encouraging industries the Government should encourage those in each section for which that section has the best advantages. Now, however, it is proposed that we discourage the raising of grains in the States that can produce them to greater advantage than any other crops merely because a foreign country would like to have our markets for grains for her own products.

There is no danger of our not producing enough wheat for our own consumption if the farmer is assured of a fair price. If, however, the farmers are to be subjected to the competition of the Canadian wheat, which can be raised more cheaply, I have no doubt that we shall be importing wheat in a few years. The Secretary of Agriculture in his report for the year 1909 discusses the probable future production of wheat in this country. He believes that with a more intensive agriculture the yield per acre of wheat will be increased——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GRONNA. Let me finish this sentence and then I will yield.

And also states that in the older States there has lately been an increase in the acreage devoted to wheat. This has operated to increase our production in addition to the increase due to new lands being brought under cultivation. He estimates that by 1950 our production may be between 3,750,000,000 and 4,750,000,000 bushels, while our consumption would not exceed 1,400,000,000 bushels, even with a population of 200,000,000.

Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. In order to save the Senator the trouble of looking up the quotation, I have the exact language here from the speech of the Senator from New York, as published in the RECORD.

Mr. WARREN. On what page?

Mr. BORAH. On page 2427. The Senator from New York said:

I do not think that as a class in general up to this time or until, perhaps, within a very short period, the protection upon food products has been of any real advantage to the farmer.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator from Idaho for his quotation. While I am inclined to believe that neither our population nor our production will be as large as indicated by the Secretary, I do believe that we shall be fully able to raise all the wheat that we require for our own consumption until 1950, and later if we do not adopt a policy of deliberately discouraging the production of wheat in this country—whether through the free admission of Canadian wheat or otherwise, I am satisfied that the free admission of wheat from Canada will mean the surrender of wheat growing to that country to a large extent for some years to come.

In the competition of the production of crops the land that produces more cheaply will prevail. In the case of the Canadian lands, the difference in the cost of transporting the wheat to our markets—if any there be—will not be sufficient to overcome the advantages which the Canadian farmer has. Some time in the future, when the Canadian lands have been cropped to the extent that ours have and require as much labor and cultivation to produce a bushel of wheat as ours now do, we may be able to compete on even terms in the production of wheat, but until that stage is reached the free admission of her grain will mean that we must to a large extent go out of the business of raising wheat, the extent depending on the rapidity with which her wheat land is brought under cultivation. This does not necessarily mean that our production of wheat will suddenly stop. Those lands that can produce wheat and other grains, but which can not produce corn to advantage, will continue to produce wheat even while there is no profit in doing so, and in most cases after it has become evident that every year's operations are carried on at a loss. As was well pointed out by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], the farm differs from a factory in that it is a home. In the case of a factory, its operation will stop when the owner is convinced that the loss from its operation is greater than the loss that would result from its remaining idle, but in the case of a farm the owner will cling to it long after it has stopped returning any profit, will curtail his expenses, both of operation and living, wherever possible, and will not leave it until he is in absolute danger of starvation. For this reason, it is to be presumed that in the event of the passage of this measure we shall continue to produce considerable wheat in competition with the Canadian wheat, even if it be produced at a loss.

Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Texas has any objection to my referring to him or not, but I want to say for myself that I appreciate that there is one Democrat, one man from the Southern States, who recognizes and values the honest toil of the farmer.

One of those appearing before the Finance Committee in favor of the Canadian reciprocity agreement, urged that it would be a benefit to North Dakota to abandon wheat growing, and gave the impression that he was in favor of forcing the North Dakota farmer to stop growing wheat and devote himself to diversified farming. There are certain kinds of diversified farming, however, to which North Dakota can not adapt itself, and the same is true of other States. But even when a State is fitted for diversified farming, it is not farsighted statesmanship to attempt to force the farmers into it. When farmers in a certain region continue to grow a certain crop, it is because it is more profitable to grow that crop. If that region is also adapted for the production of other crops, the farmers will begin to grow them when it becomes profitable to do so, which, as a rule, is when they find that they can compete successfully with other sections producing them. So far as North Dakota is concerned, I am satisfied that because of her climate and soil wheat will remain the great staple crop of the State, even though the Canadian competition makes it difficult for the farmer to grow it at a profit. With newer and consequently more productive lands, with cheaper lands, and with lower taxes, tariff and others, in Canada, the competition is an uneven one. In years to come when the conditions have become similar to those in this country, the competition may be on even terms, but until that time does come we have no right to ask the American wheat grower to compete in an open market with the Canadian wheat grower buying all his purchases in a protected market. I do not agree that we should surrender wheat growing to Canada because she can produce more cheaply. The fact that wheat can not be produced as cheaply in our wheat-growing States as in Canada does not prove that wheat is not the most profitable crop that can be produced in those States. It is not the part of wisdom to attempt to compel a State better fitted for the production of wheat than of other crops to abandon its present crop and produce those that it can produce only under a disadvantage compared with other States. If France and Germany and other countries have seen it worth while to encourage their farmers to produce enough wheat for home consumption, surely the United States should not blindly adopt a policy which some of its advocates clearly, and others by implication, state means the surrender of wheat growing to a foreign country. A nation producing its own food has within it the means of maintaining her political as well as her industrial independence. A nation dependent on other countries for her food is in danger of losing both.

The farmer of this country has not been unduly prosperous. The great fortunes which have been made—whether they are being squandered in extravagance or whether they are being used wisely in the industries—have not been made on the farm. The Select Committee on Wages and Prices of Commodities says in its report—I am sorry the distinguished chairman of the committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], is absent. I quote from the report of the committee:

> Witnesses agree that farming operations were conducted at a loss, or at best with only a very slight margin of profit for several years—> and that only during the past two or three years have farmers been able to secure a fair return on their labor and investment.

I do not know what they propose to do now.

> The wealth of the farmers has increased, but largely through increase in the value of their land. This, however, is somewhat in the nature of profit on speculation, and not a profit from crops or live stock produced.
> The State University of Minnesota—

I still quote from the report of this committee—

> The State University of Minnesota has since 1902 kept in the greatest detail records of a number of farms in that State. Allowing the farmer, his wife, and children pay at current rates for all labor performed, the net profits during the three years 1905 to 1907 was only 4.09 per cent, and this profit advanced to about 6 per cent for the two years 1908 and 1909. The profit during the past two years approximates the average interest on farm mortgages in that State.

Mr. President, I wish to say that I believe that is a true report of the condition of the farmer.

A statement submitted to the committee by Mr. Thomas P. Cooper, of the Minnesota State University, shows that the average cost of production on the farms under observation during the two years 1908 and 1909 was as follows: Wheat, 75 cents per bushel; oats, 38.3 cents per bushel; corn, 41.2 cents per bushel; barley, 40.9 cents per bushel; flax, 103.7 cents per bushel; potatoes, 30 cents per bushel.

The figures submitted by Mr. Cooper refer merely to the cost of production in Minnesota. The farm values of the crops in that State for the years 1908 and 1909 are given as follows by the Department of Agriculture:

Crops.	Farm value in cents per bushel.
	Dec. 1, 1908.	Dec. 1, 1909.
Wheat	94	96
Oats	43	35
Corn	55	49
Barley	49	47
Flax	120	150
Potatoes	56	35

Former President Roosevelt in 1908—and I ask Senators to mark some of the words of that illustrious statesman—appointed a Commission on Country Life. It consisted of Prof. L. H. Bailey, of the New York State College of Agriculture, chairman; Mr. Henry Wallace, of Wallace's Farmer; President K. L. Butterfield, of the Massachusetts Agricultural College; Mr. Gifford Pinchot, at that time chief of the Forest Service; Mr. Walter H. Page, editor of the World's Work. Later Mr. C. S. Barrett, of Georgia, and W. A. Beard, of California, were added. This commission was appointed to inquire into the conditions of country life and to consider its problems—those which the Government can help solve as well as those which must depend for their solution on the intelligence and energy of the farmer himself. In transmitting the report of this commission to Congress, Col. Roosevelt made the following statement, to which I wish to call attention:

> I warn my countrymen that the great recent progress made in city life is not a full measure of our civilization; for our civilization rests at bottom on the wholesomeness, the attractiveness, and the completeness, as well as the prosperity, of life in the country.

From the treatment that the measure now before us has received, it is evident that many of us are in danger of forgetting the truth which Col. Roosevelt so well expressed. If there was the slightest consideration of what the farmer's welfare demanded, in the framing of the agreement with Canada, there certainly is no evidence of it. The commission in its report says:

> Yet it is true, notwithstanding all this progress as measured by historical standards, that agriculture is not commercially as profitable as it is entitled to be for the labor and energy that the farmer expends and the risks that he assumes, and that the social conditions in the open country are far short of their possibilities. We must measure our agricultural efficiency by its possibilities rather than by comparison with previous conditions. The farmer is almost necessarily handicapped in the development of his business, because his capital is small and the volume of his transactions limited, and he usually stands practically alone against organized interests.

Mr. President, those are significant words.
